In all seriousness, however, it is just such speeches as the one made today by the gentleman from Michigan that brings down the wrath of righteous criticism on the membership of this House and creates a fertile field for those who hold up this Congress to ridicule.

Let me make it plain that I am not trying to lecture anyone or scold. But these are serious times. Events of 1943 will undoubtedly shape the destiny of the world for generations to come

If I know the sentiments of Members of the Seventy-eighth Congress, irrespective of political affiliation, or whether they represent the North, East, South, or West, it is the one impelling thought and determination to concentrate first on the winning of this war, to leave no stone unturned to see that the planes, guns, tanks and materials and supplies be furnished our gallant men in action on the many far-flung fronts of the world. All other matters not connected with the war effort, important though they may appear to be in ordinary times, must be relegated to the rear, including the gentleman's proposed dog-security legislation. Until there is a complete routing of the enemy on all fronts and an unconditional surrender, I beg of you that we shall put first things first, and support to the utmost our gallant men who are offering their lives, if need be, in order we may continue to live as free people and preserve our American way of life.

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 6 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include three letters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was not present to hear the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] talk about dogs, but evidently it made some impression upon the gentleman from Oklahoma, [Mr. JOHNSON], who just left the floor, and who took it upon himself to scold the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] for talking about dogs. I realize that we on the minority side should not talk about anything to which you of the majority object. We realize, too, that we should talk in a manner you would have us talk. In brief, we realize full well that you have played follow the leader so long that it is now a habit and you sometimes attempt to pass it along to us. We can only reply, No, thank you. We have had enough of the "rubber stamp" procedure.

It ill becomes those who have but echoed the New Deal words to tell us what to say and when to say it. If the Members of the minority had wasted as much time in advocating and passing and trying to enforce silly, liberty destroying legislation of which you now complain as has the majority we might be subject to criticism.

You of the majority have spent 10 years in putting on the books laws and in creating boards which now plague you and of which every day and sometimes many times a day you complain.

About all we now hear from you is condemnation of your own brain children. What unruly little brats they are.

It is very nice for you to act as schoolmasters or instructors to our side, and to tell us what we ought to talk about; but it will be more profitable, perhaps, if I may venture to suggest it, if you look after your own speeches and we will do the same on our side and let the constituents in our respective districts judge as to the value of what we may say.

Speaking of dogs, I did not hear what the gentleman from Michigan said about dogs, so I cannot make answer directly to what the gentleman from Oklahoma said about the proposed legislation; but may I say that anyone who has been yelped against and howled about as have so many Members of this House by some one or two of these radio commentators is justified in bringing to the House some sort of suggestion to limit the malicious slandering of Congress. There are many kinds of dogs; many breeds of dogs; dogs are of many colors and sizes. There are short-haired dogs, long-haired dogs, curly dogs, and dogs that are not curly. There are four-legged dogs and there are two-legged curs. There were, and there are, the dogs of the Alps which rescued many a traveler. More than once a child has been dragged from a watery grave by the faithful dog. More than once a farmer has been saved from an enraged bull by the faithful dog.

Today, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] must know it, the armies of the world, at not a little expense, are training dogs to take part in the war. Dogs carry messages of great importance. They carry first-aid kits and medicine to the wounded soldiers.

The gentleman from Oklahoma, I am constrained to believe, spoke in a thoughtless moment and does not want to be classed as unfriendly to even a dog. Throughout the history of the world the dog has been characterized as man's greatest friend. He should not begrudge to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] the 10 minutes used in an effort to conserve the dogs of the country, many of which may before this war is over, do their heroic part on the battle front. Surely, the gentleman for a moment forgot that dogs have already, in this war, been decorated for bravery and courage exhibited in battle.

To show the opinion held by some of the yelping human beings who stand on two legs and who are not dogs, permit me to read from two letters received this morning. One from Jacksonville, Fla. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi if that is what he would call the deep South?

Mr. RANKIN. There is a map out there in the hall. If the gentleman will look at it he will see where Jacksonville, Fla., is situated.

Mr. HOFFMAN. When I have a walking-talking encyclopedia right in front of me, why waste my energy to go out there and look at a map.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say "Yes" to the gentleman. Jacksonville, Fla., is in the deep South.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I thank the gentleman. This comes from the Florida Beacon, Jacksonville, Fla. It reads as follows:

JANUARY 25, 1943.

The ANDREW JERGENS Co.,
Cincinnati, Ohio:

I see that you have turned loose on the public again that disturber, Walter Winchell, with his egotism and unreliable statements.

In his broadcast last evening he repeated what he claimed was a quotation from a speech he had said Congressman Houston, of Kansas, had made, in which Congressman HOFFMAN, of Michigan, had been given a drubbing.

The only thing wrong with this is that nowhere in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD do such words appear; also there is no one by the name of Houston in Congress, either from Kansas or any other State. There was a party by that name in a previous Congress, but he was repudiated at the polls by his constituents; and his present address is Wichita, Kans., and not Washington, D. C. Winchell in his broadcast was careful to conceal the fact.

Here is another one that came in from New York and it reads as follows:

Is it not about time that this loud-mouth Walter Winchell who shouts forth his feuds over the radio every Sunday evening was muzzled?

How is it he can get away with the kind of stuff he puts over the air when other people are frozen out, the public are getting tired of this fellow. He was off the air for a few weeks which I can truthfully say added refinement to Jergens lotion broadcast.

If he is wearing a Navy uniform why in hell don't they put him on a ship and keep him off the air, he seems to air all his fights over the radio.

This would be a good time for Congressman Cox to ask Mr. Fly why he is permitted to go on the air with his insulting remarks to advertise some cheap skin lotion.

I think the gentleman is in error about that latter statement. I do not think it is cheap. It may smell that way, but it is not cheap in price. If it is no more reliable than its mouthpiece it is of little value.

So may I say to the gentleman who protests the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan, that the gentleman from Michigan does love dogs, and I never knew that to be a crime.

Now that we are in this war, of course, our first business is to take care of the people, but I suppose that before the war is over some of these doers of good, like Harry Hopkins and some others of those people down there, will be taking care of the dogs, the Chinese dogs, and the Hottentot and the Bushmen dogs, and the dogs of all those people down in South Africa, and in India, Europe, and Asia. If they are going to take care of those dogs all over the world, why should my colleague from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] be criticized for advocating a measure, which he thinks will conserve dogs, when many of them are being sought by the Army for war service, and for thinking that maybe the dogs here in America should be protected? Congress has been treated like dogs. During the last campaign we were treated worse than our dogs. I have been wondering if we would have courage enough to insist finally that some of those who have been abusing, and misusing and kicking us around as though we were dogs, without even giving us the privilege that is given to a dog when kicked—I am wondering whether those on the majority side will not kindly join with us and get Resolution 13 out from the Committee on Rules and bring up this man Maloney and Winchell and the convict Browder—there are three good ones, Maloney, Browder—put Browder in the middle and Walter Winchell at the end—bring up those three fellows and let us see what they are up to, and what they are doing, and who is paying them, and what their purpose is. We know it, but let us spread it on the record. Their purpose is to destroy the confidence of the people in the Congress, not in the individual Members but the Congress as a whole.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Will the gentleman extend his mercies to the Frankfurter "hot dogs" also?

Mr. HOFFMAN. From what I can see and learn, and from what I learn from the Supreme Court reports, the Frankfurters are very well able to take care of themselves. They need no help from Congress. Congress should watch its step that it does not fall under the Frankfurter ban.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not believe that is the resolution the gentleman from Oklahoma had in mind when he was speaking, though.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No. As I understand, he was talking about the talk made today by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY]. Perhaps it was a waste of time, and maybe I waste more time than anyone else, but I have some close seconds over on the other side.

[Here the gavel fell.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HARE, for 2 days, on account of important business.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1943

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God of grace and glory, we would yield our flickering torch to the flame of Thy redeeming love. Strengthened with might in the inner man, send us forth to quest and conquest on the wings of this new morning, sustained by a faith that will not shrink though pressed by every foe.

Into Thy keeping we confide and commit our loved ones, our fighting men, our country, and our cause. In all danger and distress, in all anxiety and perplexity, keep them and us, that, upheld by Thy might even in these turbulent days we may live quietly, confidently, and victoriously. Strengthen us to carry our share of the burden of mankind's advance toward Thy will, in the Nation and in all the earth. Solemnize us with the responsibility of ability. With the vision splendid may we be found among the pathfinders of humanity—leading another day's march toward the bright and beckoning land of promise.

"God of justice, save the people
From the clash of race and creed;
From the strife of class and faction,
Make her nation free indeed.
Keep our faith in simple manhood
Strong as when her life began,
Till it find its full fruition
In the brotherhood of man."

Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 28, 1943, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

OATH OF OFFICE TO SERGEANT AT ARMS

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Sergeant-at-Arms-elect will present himself at the desk the oath of office will be administered to him.

Wall Doxey, of Mississippi, advanced to the Vice President's desk and the oath of office as Sergeant at Arms of the Senate was administered to him by the Vice President.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF SENATOR CARAWAY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I rise to call attention to the fact that today is the anniversary of the birth of one of the eminent Members of this body. I recall with great pleasure that I entered the House of Representatives on the same day on which her husband became a Member of that body from the State of Arkansas. I served with him in the House for many years. Later I also served with him in the Senate. I have served in the Senate with his widow, the present distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] for many years. She is an outstanding American woman. She has two boys, both of whom are at this hour in the service, wearing the uniform of their country.

Mr. President, I call attention to this birthday anniversary because I wish to congratulate the senior Senator from Arkansas upon the distinguished service which she and her family have rendered and are rendering to the United States of America. I am sure that not only in Arkansas, but in the country at large, that service will be cherished as a tradition by all the people of our country.

If Mrs. CARAWAY were no older than she looks she would not be eligible for membership in the Senate of the United States. [Laughter.] I congratulate her. I am sure we all congratulate her and wish for her many, many returns of this happy day which we are celebrating for her and which she celebrates today, and I personally wish for her and her two boys the greatest of success and happiness and honor in the service of their country.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I wish to offer my felicitations and congratulations to the distinguished young lady from Arkansas on her birthday anniversary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

SPECIAL STATISTICAL STUDIES BY DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report showing special statistical studies made by the Department upon payment of the cost thereof, together with the names of those for whom work has been performed, the nature of the service rendered, the price therefor, and the manner in which the moneys received were deposited or used (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT OF SELECTIVE TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT

A letter from the Director of Selective Service, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, so as to extend the benefits of the Employees' Compensation Act to persons assigned to work of national importance under civilian direction (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EMPLOYEES RECEIVING $3,000 AND OVER, OFFICE OF DEFENSE TRANSPORTATION—CORRECTION OF ERROR

A letter from the administrative officer, Office of Defense Transportation, stating that on January 5, 1942, that agency submitted, pursuant to Senate Resolution 322, Seventy-seventh Congress, a list of employees drawing salaries of $3,000 per annum or over, and that through a clerical error Mr. Heston H. Walker, of the Washington office, was shown as earning a salary of $5,600 per annum whereas actually his yearly compensation is $3,800; to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORT OF CAPITAL TRANSIT CO.

A letter from the president of the Capital Transit Co., Washington, D. C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report covering the operations of that company for the calendar year 1942, with balance sheet as of December 31, 1942 (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

A letter from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, lists of papers and documents on the files of the Departments of the Treasury, Interior, and Agriculture (4); National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, National Housing Agency, Federal Works Agency, and Executive Office of the President (2) (National Resources Planning Board and Office of War Information) which are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and requesting action looking to their disposition (with accompanying papers); to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

PETITION

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of Winchester, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit liquor sales and to suppress vice in the vicinity of military camps and naval establishments, which was ordered to lie on the table.

COMPENSATION OF POSTAL WORKERS—PETITION

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the postal workers of this country have not received an increase in their wages for the past 18 years. In the matter of compensation these valuable and indispensable workers stand today where they have stood during all that long period. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks and appropriately referred, a letter in the nature of a petition which I have received from the Central Labor Union of Pittsburgh, Pa., signed by M. J. Dorsey, president, and John A. Stackhouse, secretary. The letter embodies a resolution adopted by the Pittsburgh Central Labor Union urging favorable action on legislation designed to improve the condition of this very worthy body of governmental workers.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Post

Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PITTSBURGH CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
Pittsburgh, Pa., January 21, 1943.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,

DEAR SENATOR: At a meeting of the Pittsburgh Central Labor Union held at Pittsburgh, Pa., on January 21, 1943, the following resolution was adopted by unanimous vote:

"Postal workers have not received a salary increase since the passage of the Kelly bill, made effective January 1, 1925. In 1932 each postal employee was furloughed 1 month without pay. In 1933, by the passage of the Economy Act, their salaries were reduced 15 percent, or $315 per year. In succeeding years this act was repealed; 10 percent retrieved in one session of Congress and 5 percent in a later one; and

"Whereas postal salaries stand today exactly where they stood more than 18 years ago. The War Labor Board, after finding that the cost of living had risen 15 percent by January 1, 1941, allowed a 15-percent wage increase in all cases adjudicated by their Board. However, since all decisions rendered were those of strikes, walk-outs, or other threatened work stoppages, postal employees were bypassed; and

"Whereas we as citizens of this Republic have an abiding interest in postal workers; our own employees. Their loyalty, patriotism, and efficiency are beyond question. They are not permitted to strike nor engage actively in politics. The increased and increasing cost of living is ample justification for a wage increase at this time, in common with workers in private industry; and

"Whereas Senator JAMES M. MEAD, of New York, has introduced in the Senate S. 360 and Congressman GEORGE D. O'BRIEN of Michigan, an identical bill (H. R. 1366) in the House of Representatives, which provide a bonus of $300 per year to each postal employee for the duration of the war and for 6 months thereafter. The measure of increase allowed by the Mead-O'Brien bill is less than 15 percent above the salary now in effect fixed more than 18 years ago; and

"Whereas we, recognizing the soundness and justice of this modest proposal, realizing that their appeal must be made to Congress through the people as a whole; that in order to meet the mounting living expenses prevalent in wartimes, added income is required; that this measure is fair alike to the Government and the worker, and will help to maintain the present high standard of efficiency in the Postal System: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we earnestly request your vote and active support for S. 360 and H. R. 1366, otherwise known as the Mead-O'Brien bill, to the end that justice may be done to this large body of steady, industrious, and capable governmental workers."

Sincerely,

M. J. DORSEY, President.
JOHN A. STACKHOUSE,
Secretary.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE

Mr. MALONEY, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 28) continuing the Special Committee to Investigate Gasoline Shortages, reported it without amendment, and, under the rule, the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GILLETTE:

S. 592. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious political activities," approved August 2, 1939, as amended, with respect to the circulation of matter concerning candidates for election to Federal offices;

S. 593. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious political activities," approved August 2, 1939, as amended, with respect to the limitations on political contributions and expenditures; and

S. 594. A bill to protect the integrity of the democratic process by requiring disclosure of persons writing, publishing, and circulating scurrilous literature in connection with political campaigns; to deny the use of the mails to such literature and to prohibit its importation into the United States, in default of such disclosure; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

By Mr. HILL:

S. 595. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Hal S. Martin; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 596. A bill to amend the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

S. 597. A bill to amend the act of September 22, 1941 (Public Law 252, 77th Cong.), with relation to the temporary appointments of officers in the Army of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

S. 598. A bill for the relief of John E. Creighton; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 599. A bill amending the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, as amended, and providing for payment of compensation for permanent and total disability ratings of tubercular World War veterans; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 600. A bill for the relief of Eldredge L. Brown; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 601. A bill granting a pension to Chief Red Bird; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KILGORE:

S. 602. A bill for the relief of the L. J. Houze Convex Glass Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 603. A bill for the relief of Henry Angell; to the Committee on Immigration.

S. 604. A bill granting a pension to Earl E. Bayles;

S. 605. A bill granting an increase of pension to Earl W. Newlon; and

S. 606. A bill granting an increase of pension to Martha L. E. Bromberg; to the Committee on Pensions.

(Mr. KILGORE also (for himself, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BALL, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. GREEN, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. THOMAS of Utah) introduced Senate bill 607, which was ordered to lie on the table, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 608. A bill for the relief of the Meadows School district (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McNARY:

S. 609. A bill for the relief of Sloper, Patton, & Gooch; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CAPPER:

S. 610. A bill to establish a Division of Cooperatives in the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

S. 611. A bill granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. O'Brien;

S. 612. A bill granting an increase of pension to Eliza A. Perry;

S. 613. A bill granting an increase of pension to Anna Perkins; and

S. 614. A bill granting an increase of pension to Susanne Katharina Reinhardt; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DAVIS:

S. 615. A bill to provide for the issuance of furlough travel certificates to persons serving in the armed forces; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELLENDER:

S. 616. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary Vullo; to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I introduce a bill, which is a duplicate of a bill which was acted upon at the last session by the Committee on Military Affairs, was favorably reported by that committee, and then favorably acted upon by the Senate. I ask that with that history the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be so referred.

By Mr. O'MAHONEY:

S. 617. A bill for the relief of Homer C. Chapman; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. VAN NUYS:

S. 618. A bill to provide for a general term of the District Court for the District of Alaska at Anchorage, Alaska;

S. 619. A bill to extend the terms of judges of the district courts in Alaska, Hawaii, and the Virgin Islands to 8 years; and

S. 620. A bill to authorize the appointment of court reporters in the district courts of the United States; to fix their duties; to provide for their compensation; and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WALSH:

S. 621. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to grant to the city of San Diego for street purposes a parcel of land situated in the city of San Diego and State of California; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH (for himself and Mr. CLARK of Missouri):

S. 622. A bill to authorize and to direct the Veterans' Administration to provide vocational rehabilitation and assistance in securing suitable employment for service-connected disabled veterans in need thereof and feasible therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

(Mr. WALSH also introduced Senate bill 623, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. CHAVEZ:

S. 624. A bill for the relief of substitutes in the Postal Service; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

OFFICE OF WAR MOBILIZATION—REFERENCE OF BILL

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and myself, I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, because a similar bill in the last session was before that committee and hearings have been held thereon by the committee.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia why the bill should be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor? Why should it not go to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, which is one of the defense committees of the Senate and which should have an opportunity to consider the great question which is involved in the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. The reason for the request is that the Committee on Education and Labor at the previous session had under consideration a similar bill, on which hearings were conducted for about 6 weeks, and the committee probably can submit a report on the bill in a very short time because it was ready to report the previous bill, but not in time to have it acted on before the close of the session. The only reason I make the request is in order that the bill may go to the committee which has already heard testimony on the subject and be ready for report at an early date, with the minimum amount of hearings.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator would object to a reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. KILGORE. I think it would involve the repetition of about 2 months' work. That is the reason why I should object. This bill should be brought on the floor with the minimum of delay.

Mr. BRIDGES. Can the Senator give any logical explanation, outside the fact that the Committee on Education and Labor has had a similar bill before it, why it should go to that committee rather than to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes; because it deals largely with the civilian effort in the war, with labor, production, and things of that nature, which the Committee on Education and Labor, rather than the Military Affairs Committee or the Naval Affairs Committee, considered during the last session when the previous bill was introduced, and the Senate decided that the Committee on Education and Labor could cover the subject just as well as any other committee. Furthermore, as I have said, that committee has taken a great amount of testimony on the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the question where the particular bill introduced by the Senator from West Virginia should go, but I think it is important at the very earliest date possible to determine the jurisdiction as between the Military Affairs Committee and the Committee on Education and Labor in regard to bills of this character. There is, undoubtedly, a twilight zone, due largely to the fact that bills affecting the same thing have been referred to both committees in the past, but it is very confusing to have legislation go to two committees or to have any doubt as to which committee it ought to go. Inasmuch as we are probably going to adjourn over until Thursday, and no action will be taken in the meantime, I would suggest that the matter of reference be left open until that time, so that the Vice President, in his capacity as Presiding Officer, who must determine these matters, may look into the question where the bill should be sent.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I hope that arrangement will be made. There are four or five committees now studying the problem involved. In order to have the matter settled and to have the Vice President afforded an opportunity to determine what should be the proper reference of the bill, I, too, should like to have the matter go over until Thursday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Obviously, many Senators in their capacity as members of different committees are more familiar with the contents of the bill than is the Vice President. The Vice President, perhaps setting another precedent in regard to committee reference, is going to ask that the Senate take on itself the obligation to determine the reference when there is a question of sharp difference of opinion.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that event, Mr. President, I think the matter should go over until Thursday, if the Senate is to be asked to pass on the reference, so that Senators can familiarize themselves with the bill, and somewhat with the precedents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reference will be passed over until Thursday. The bill will lie on the table until Thursday.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no choice as to which committee this bill shall go, but certainly we should reach some conclusion as to the reference of bills which deal with a subject jurisdiction of which is being claimed by two or more committees, particularly when it might be said that any one of two or three committees might have a right properly to claim jurisdiction. The question should be settled, so that the Vice President would have something to guide him in determining where a bill should go, and so that the Senate itself would know where bills should go.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I am in accord with the able majority leader. I think a rule should be established, and I am perfectly willing that the reference of the bill I am presenting should go over until Thursday. I am not a member of the Committee on Education and Labor; I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, but I am in accord with the majority leader in this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain a motion Thursday as to the committee to which the Senate desires to have this particular bill referred.

The bill (S. 607) to establish an Office of War Mobilization, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT—EXTENSION OF INSURANCE BENEFITS TO CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Social Security Act, and ask unanimous consent that a memorandum explanatory of the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts will be referred to the Committee on Finance, and the memorandum will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 623) to extend the Federal old-age and survivors insurance benefits of the Social Security Act to certain employees of religious and charitable organizations, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorandum presented by Mr. WALSH in connection with the bill is as follows:

This bill will extend the Federal old-age and survivors insurance benefits of the Social Security Act to certain employees of religious and charitable organizations. If enacted into law, it will add over a million persons to those already embraced within the provisions of the existing law.

In 1935–36 representatives of the churches, colleges, and hospitals asked for and received exemption of their employees from the Social Security Act. Many of these same organizations for the past few years have been considering ways and means of having their employees included within the Social Security Act without interfering with the general provisions of law which exempt religious, educational, and charitable institutions from taxation.

The bill now being introduced is the result of these deliberations and, in effect, will provide for the inclusion under old-age and survivors insurance provisions of the Social Security Act and the corresponding taxing or contribution section of the Internal Revenue Code of all employees of religious, educational, and charitable institutions except ministers of religion and members of religious orders.

In view of the fact that legislation to include these groups has been recommended by the Social Security Board in its report to the President dated December 30, 1938, and by the Advisory Council of Social Security in its report dated December 10, 1938, the action of representatives of the churches, colleges, and hospitals makes the change certain.

The bill would safeguard the tax-exempt status of the religious and charitable agency paying the tax by requiring that all revenues collected from such tax-exempt agencies "shall be paid directly into the Federal Old Age and Survivors Insurance trust fund" and in this way the proposed amendment would in reality convert what otherwise would be a general tax into a true contribution to a trust fund available only for the payment of old-age benefits and not subject to appropriation by Congress for any other purpose.

The bill would result in extending the coverage of old-age and survivors insurance benefits to all lay employees of the tax-exempt charitable, religious, and educational agencies heretofore excluded. It would continue to exclude from old-age and survivors benefits all clergy, sisters, and brothers of religious orders attached to schools, colleges, hospitals, homes for the aged, and all other charitable institutions.

The proposed amendment would subject these lay employees and their employers to the payment of the taxes levied for the support of the old-age and survivors insurance benefits system which at the present time are levied at the rate of 1 percent of wages received by the employee and of wages paid by the employer and which under the Social Security Act may be increased gradually but never without new legislation exceed 3 percent of wages received and wages paid.

The religious, charitable, and educational institutions that have agreed to this proposal, approve of the legislation and request favorable action are the following: National Council Protestant Episcopal Church (speaking for itself and not the whole church); National Catholic Welfare Conference; Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds; American Hospital Association; American Association of Social Workers; Community Chests and Councils, Inc., and National Recreation Association.

The principle of the amendment is favored by the Social Security Board and it will be included in the general revision of the Social Security Act which has been contemplated for some time.

REESTABLISHMENT OF REGIONAL AGRICULTURAL CREDIT CORPORATION AND CONSOLIDATION OF AGRICULTURAL LENDING AGENCIES

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution, to be referred to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Expenditures, in connection with the concurrent resolution, a letter which I sent to the Secretary of Agriculture on January 28, which briefly, in three paragraphs, sets forth the purpose of the concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be received and referred to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, and the letter will be printed in the RECORD, and also referred to the same joint committee.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 6) is as follows:

Whereas on January 23, 1943, the Secretary of Agriculture in a formal release stated that through the Food Production Administration 5 percent 1-year agricultural loans would be made available to farmers to provide funds to aid war-food growing, that $225,000,000 was available for that purpose; that this program was not a substitute for other sources of credit or intended to compete with other lenders, but that its purpose was to supplement such other sources of credit where needed and that producers were to be urged to obtain their financial requirements, if possible, from other sources; and

Whereas there is already in operation the Production Credit Corporation, a governmental lending agency which provides, on a commercial basis, agricultural loans in direct competition with private enterprise, and also in operation the Farm Security Administration, a governmental agency which provides credit to eligible farmers who desire to rehabilitate themselves on the land, both of which were created to provide funds for farmers, that they might produce agricultural products; and

Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture has stated that the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation (formerly known as the Barnyard Loan Agency) is to be revived as another Government-subsidized lending agency, to be financed out of public funds, where there is already in operation the Production Credit Corporation and the Farm Security Administration which have similar functions; and

Whereas it is believed the functions and activities of such Government-subsidized lending agencies could be appropriately handled, through available facilities of private lending agencies, without detriment to agriculture or impairment of all-out agricultural production, inasmuch as private lending agencies now have available money to make agricultural loans without reviving any governmental lending agency, without unnecessary governmental expenditures, and without competition with private enterprise or prejudice to private lending agencies; and

Whereas a consolidation of the agricultural lending agencies of the Government, or a proper correlation of their functions, activities, and services with those of private lending agencies, should provide the same equivalent service to agriculture as is now being provided by such Government-subsidized lending agencies, and would not result in loss to the agricultural producer but would benefit him, would eliminate unnecessary agencies, would conserve public funds, would eliminate duplicity, would release and provide needed manpower and materials for other lines of endeavor, and would be feasible: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures created by section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1941 is hereby requested, in connection with the investigations provided for by such section 601, to investigate the need for the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation and its reestablishment, to determine whether the making available of $225,000,000 of public moneys for lending purposes is an essential or nonessential expenditure and to determine whether the consolidation of all agricultural lending agencies of the Government, or the correlation of the functions of such agencies with the services of private lending agencies, would result in the conservation of public moneys and release manpower and materials to other essential activities.

The letter presented by Mr. WHERRY is as follows:

JANUARY 28, 1943.

MR. CLAUDE R. WICKARD,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Department of Agriculture,

MY DEAR SECRETARY: On January 23, you made a formal release stating that through the agency of the Food Production Administration, 5-percent 1-year agricultural loans would be made available to farmers to provide funds to aid them in war food growing, and that $225,000,000 was available for that purpose.

Your release further stated that the proposed program "is not a substitute for other sources of credit, nor is it intended to compete with other lenders. Each producer is urged to obtain his financial requirements, if possible, from other sources." I would appreciate enlightment on the exact meaning you attached to the phrase "from other sources." Do you mean other governmental lending agencies, or do you mean private lending agencies, or both?

I have received many protests from private lending agencies who have become aroused at the further extension of your lending program, and especially at your proposals to revamp the old R. A. C. C. and set up the machinery when there are already two governmental agencies—the Production Credit Corporation and the Farm Security Administration—that are making loans to farmers for this purpose.

The private lending agencies, which include country banks, have funds in abundance for this purpose, but find themselves confronted and competing with Government-subsidized credit.

I suggest that some regulation be promulgated by proper authority which would require that before borrowers obtain loans from any of these agencies that they be required to certify that they have applied for and were unable to secure funds from their local lending agencies, or in the alternative if such funds are not so available, then the Farm Credit Administration should and could arrange to handle such loans through private lending agencies.

This would encourage the continuation of private lending agencies and would forego the reviving of the R. A. C. C., which in reality is setting up another bureau at an enormous and unnecessary expense to the taxpayers of this country.

Yours truly,

KENNETH S. WHERRY.

INVESTIGATION OF LABOR SHORTAGE IN PACIFIC COAST AND ROCKY MOUNTAIN STATES

Mr. DOWNEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 88), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to (1) the existing shortage of labor in the Pacific Coast and Rocky Mountain States and its effect upon the efficient and successful prosecution of the war effort, and (2) methods of relieving such shortage. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-eighth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

ARMY AIRPLANE ACCIDENTS — CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR FOR AIR

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD correspondence relating to Army airplane accidents between Hon. Robert A. Lovett, Assistant Secretary of War for Air, and myself.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 21, 1943.

Hon. ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Assistant Secretary of War for Air,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: You will recall that last fall I talked with you in reference to the number of accidents in South Carolina. Recently there have been quite a few and naturally many of the people have written me regarding the same.

I do wish if you have any information on the situation that is consistent with the War Department's policy to release that you might inform me.

I do hope that it has been decreased and if it has been I would appreciate your advising me in order that I may give publicity to this information. I believe it will be of great benefit to the many who are interested if you could write me exactly the record that is being made, and, of course, if it is consistent with the policy of the War Department to publicize the same.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

BURNET R. MAYBANK.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ASSISTANT SECRETARY FOR AIR,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1943.

The Honorable BURNET R. MAYBANK,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MAYBANK: In reply to your letter of January 21 requesting information about accidents in Army airplanes, we welcome the opportunity to set forth the facts in the case.

All activities of the Army Air Forces in the United States have been expanded in the past year far beyond the realization of even the best informed public. In the first 8 months of 1942 (the latest completely tabulated figures available) 74.3 percent more hours were flown than in the whole 10-year period from 1930 to 1940. Ninety-eight and five-tenths percent more miles were flown from January through August 1942 than in the entire 10 years, 1930 to 1940. This 8 months' mileage was equivalent to over 48,000 trips around the world.

In spite of this extraordinary expansion the rate of accidents per 1,000 hours flown was lower in the 1942 period than the 10-year peacetime average.

Accident rates fluctuate from month to month and from year to year. Hence an average is used to obtain a reliable comparison. The figures for the first 8 months of 1942 show that the accident rate per 1,000 hours during that period was actually eleven one-hundredths lower than the rate for the 10-year peacetime period from 1930 to 1940. The rate of fatal accidents is up only fourteen one-thousandths compared with the 10-year average.

The increase in fatalities results primarily from two factors: (a) the great increase in speed and weight of modern combat planes as compared with the peacetime planes; and, (b) the very great increase in the size of the planes and the number of persons carried as crew. Since a larger number of men are frequently involved in a single accident today, the rate of fatalities per 1,000 hours has increased five one-hundredths compared with the 10-year peacetime average.

These figures are striking, and especially so when it is realized that our training schools and operational training units are operating under pressure of war. Furthermore, before sending combat crews into combat theaters in varying climatic conditions completely around the world, it is necessary to train them in a variety of weather conditions so that, when they meet the enemy in life and death combat, they will not have the added hazard of running into flying conditions and weather with which they are not experienced.

The military airplane is a weapon—perhaps the most powerful one in existence. Such planes are very fast, heavily armed, and carry explosives. Nevertheless, in the face of these facts it is notable that the frequency rate of accidents is still actually lower per hours flown than the average of the peacetime years mentioned above.

The Army Air Forces are understandably determined to maintain the fine record which has resulted from unceasing attention to safety measures and control. The Directorate of Flying Safety is continually improving safety techniques in order to keep accidents at the lowest rate consistent with the hazards necessarily involved in the primary task of the Army Air Forces, which is to make our pilots the best combat pilots in the world.

We feel sure that the public is prepared for unavoidable accidents, but they are entitled to know all the facts which can be given short of disclosing information which would be useful to the enemy. Accordingly, as a matter of policy the Army Air Forces do not withhold from the press news of accidents. In consequence, the publicity such occurrences receive has created in the minds of some people the wrong impression that accidents are increasing at an alarming rate and that proper measures are not being taken to reduce them. The facts given at the outset of this letter prove that the opposite is the truth.

It is well to point out at this time that the number of accidents has increased and will increase in some proportion to the tremendous increase in the number of planes flying and the number of hours flown. This is so for the same reason that there are more accidents in a State with 1,000,000 automobiles than in another one with 100,000 cars. The important criterion is whether the rate of accidents in relation to the number of hours flown has increased disproportionately.

A knowledge of the true facts and of the determined efforts which are constantly made to protect the lives of our men in training and to give them a better fighting chance against an enemy seasoned by years of combat experience should result in continued confidence by the public in the carefully planned and supervised program of the Army Air Forces.

You may use this letter in any way you wish. If you decide to use it, I trust that you will agree with me that it is best to have it published in full rather than in part.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Assistant Secretary of War for Air.

JANUARY 30, 1943.

Hon. ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Assistant Secretary of War for Air,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Please permit me to thank you for your letter of January 28 and commend and congratulate those who have made such a splendid record.

I am indeed happy to have this information in order that I may have it placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the people of the United States will fully appreciate what the Army Air Force is doing in these perilous times.

With my kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

BURNET R. MAYBANK.

QUORUM FOR TRANSACTION OF BUSINESS BY COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Finance Committee, by unanimous agreement at its first meeting of the Seventy-eighth Congress, on Friday, January 29, 1943, adopted an order which I desire to have entered in the RECORD after it has been read by the clerk.

I may say that the order is the reestablishment of a policy of the committee which prevailed throughout the Seventy-seventh and previous Congresses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Finance Committee, by unanimous agreement at its first meeting of the Seventy-eighth Congress, on Friday, January 29, 1943, adopted the following order:

"That seven members of the committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of such business as may be considered by the committee during the Seventy-eighth Congress."

FRAUD IN WAR INDUSTRIES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I was shocked a few days ago when I read a front-page editorial in the Kansas City Kansan, published in Kansas City, Kans., disclosing that a Federal grand jury, district of Kansas, had found practices in war-production plants in the Kansas City area which had resulted in the assembly and in the manufacture of faulty and defective war materials and utilities.

The grand jury found that there was callous indifference with regard to the character and quality of personnel in certain inspection departments and an apparent lack of cooperation between production and inspection.

The grand jury also found that these things, which affect the safety and lives of our men in the armed services, and some of which apparently might have serious repercussions on the entire war effort, had been condoned, overlooked, or encouraged by supervisors or officials.

Mr. President, if careless selection of personnel, careless supervision of work, careless work, and careless or perfunctory inspections are resulting in turning out inferior equipment in our war plants, then those in charge should take immediate and forceful steps to remedy this condition.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial referred to and a copy of the grand jury findings forwarded to the Kansas delegation in Congress be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial and findings were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Kansas City Kansan of January 22, 1943]

A SCATHING CRITICISM

The Federal grand jury's caustic criticism of loose production procedure in war industries in this area is a matter of utmost importance to the entire Nation, in fact it is vital to the entire United Nation's war effort. The conditions reviewed by the grand jury may exist in war industries in other communities where pressure production methods are being used to speed production.

Our fighting men must be given plenty of fighting equipment. But every precaution against defective fighting equipment must be taken.

The grand jury asserted bluntly that it had received evidences of certain practices in war plants here, arising from the pressure of production, which resulted in the assembly and in the manufacture of faulty and defective war materials and utilities.

It claimed that it had discovered callous indifference with regard to the character and quality of personnel in certain inspection departments, that it had found an apparent lack of cooperation between production and inspection. And to top it off, the jury claimed that these things apparently had been condoned, overlooked, or encouraged by supervisors or officials.

The whole productive procedure, in the estimation of the grand jury, is such as to create "additional and unnecessary hazards to our men and women in the military forces and such as to constitute either sabotage, fraud against the Government, or other possible violations of the laws of the United States."

This is criticism so scathing and serious that it cannot be overlooked. It points to something far deeper than ordinary human carelessness. It charges indifference both to the lives of our fighting forces and to the very life of the Nation in the greatest crisis of war it has ever encountered.

Not since Washington issued a wave of criticism of public complacency toward the war effort a year ago has such a serious criticism been heard. In all fairness, it is a matter that should be gone into thoroughly even to the point, as the grand jury suggests, of immediate and thorough consideration by our courts and the National Congress.

GENTLEMEN: A Federal grand jury was charged by Judge Hopkins in Kansas City on December 7, 1942. The grand jury adjourned from December 18 until January 4, but other than that was in continuous session from December 7, 1942, to January 21, 1943.

For the most part, the grand jury engaged in an investigation of certain monopoly practices of the chain grocery stores, but near the end of the session the grand jury considered a complaint against an employee of North American Aviation, Kansas City, Kans., and a stenographic report was made of the testimony before the grand jury by a large number of North American employees and officials.

It was in connection with that investigation that the grand jury made a special report in writing to Judge Hopkins, and you will notice the last paragraph of the report directs that copies be furnished to the United States Senators and Members of Congress from the State of Kansas. I have the honor to here transmit copies of that report.

Most sincerely,

KANSAS CITY, KANS., January 21, 1943.

Hon. RICHARD J. HOPKINS,
United States District Judge,
Kansas City, Kans.:

In the court's charge to the grand jury at the beginning of this term of court it was indicated that the jury could and should inquire into and investigate any act by any individual which might constitute a violation of the laws of the United States. In accordance with such admonition, the jury directed the United States attorney to present whatever evidence there was obtainable concerning acts of individuals engaged either as workmen or officials in certain war and defense industries in this district in the manufacture or assembly of war or national defense products or material in such a defective manner as to create additional and unnecessary hazards to our men and women in the military forces, and such as to constitute either sabotage, fraud against the Government, or other possible violations of the laws of the United States.

A considerable amount of testimony was heard, and while no indictments have been returned by this grand jury charging violation of the United States statutes with respect to these matters, your jury feels tha certain practices have been engaged in by both employees and supervising personnel a plants engaged in the assembling and manufacture of war materials and products in this district with respect to pressure of production of such materials and products which has resulted in the assembly and in the manufac ture of faulty and defective war materials and utilities.

In the light of testimony presented, this grand jury feels that there has been exhibited a callous indifference respecting the character and quality of personnel in certain inspection departments. There also exists an apparent lack of cooperation between production and inspection.

In the opinion of this jury, such practices, apparently condoned, overlooked, or encouraged by supervisors or officials, are certainly not only to be condemned, but should be the subject of thought and earnest consideration by the law-making power of the Government, looking to the enactment of additional legislation covering such practices, as well as the subject of exploration and investigation by future grand juries convened in this district. This investigation should be made, in the opinion of this jury, in an attempt to fix the proper responsibility on those who may be guilty of causing such war materials and utilities to be manufactured or assembled in a defective manner.

The necessity for rapid production of war materials at this time is vital to this Nation. But, in the opinion of this grand jury, a system which under the guise of pressure of production tolerates, encourages, or overlooks the defective manufacture or assembly of war materials or parts is reprehensible. It is further the opinion of this grand jury that if the responsibility for such a system, if existing, can be fixed, that such system should be indictable under the laws of this Government, and manifestly be a subject of future investigation by other grand juries, and by other law enforcement agencies, as well as given the attention of legislative bodies.

It is, therefore, respectfully suggested that this honorable court call matters of this nature to the attention of a grand jury which may be convened in the future in order that further investigative attention be given such practices, if existing, with a view of presenting indictments, if there is, in the opinion of such jury, probable cause to believe that any individual, firm, or corporation has violated laws of the United States.

It is also respectfully suggested that copies of this report be forwarded to the Representatives in Congress from this State in order that the attention of the law-making power of the Government be directed to this matter, and that it be given the consideration which it deserves.

EFFECT OF GASOLINE RATIONING IN NORTH DAKOTA ON FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, ever-increasing demands are being made continuously upon the farmer to step up food production, while at the same time farm equipment, machinery repairs, and transportation programs are being curtailed and a critical shortage of skilled farm labor is rapidly developing. In times such as these we need to know exactly how the various rationing programs are affecting the food-production efforts of our farmers.

With that thought in mind, I submit a résumé of a few typical reports from North Dakota showing first-hand how gasoline rationing actually works out in an agricultural State and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. Albert B. Prestbo, president, Northwood Commercial Club, Northwood, N. Dak.:

"Many farmers must avail themselves of the B or C coupons or look for greater elasticity in the rationing system; as an illustration, in the rigors of the northwestern climate, which includes North Dakota, a farmer might easily consume his entire quota of gasoline in trying to get a stalled car out of a snowdrift, and frequent emergencies arise which compel him to make from some distance out several trips to town the same day or to a neighbor's or a relative to help care for livestock or milk cows or to borrow or return articles and the like, when his ordinary quota of gas would be entirely inadequate.

"It is true, however, that many large farm operators here who had their quotas cut from the actual and necessary representation of their needs, will find themselves really crippled for their spring's work unless changes are made in the quotas allowed them. These farmers intend to lay their cards on the table when the time comes for their greatest need of gas and hope to be accommodated; if they are not taken care of the war effort itself must suffer. They trust, hope, and believe that their efforts to carry on with livestock, especially, will not be handicapped.

"The tire situation, of course, is infinitely worse than the gas-rationing program, and will tax to the utmost the ingenuity and resourcefulness of the farming community, the truckers and haulers, etc.

"The community, we are sure, will do all within its power to comply with any reasonable and necessary regulations to aid in bringing victory to the Allied forces, and there is daily evidence of this fact and of the patriotic cooperation of the citizens of the Northwood community."

Wesley E. Keller, vice president, Truax-Traer Coal Co., lignite division, Minot, N. Dak.:

"In our case, it is our understanding that under Office of Price Administration ruling, salesmen of essential commodities such as coal are entitled to either 8,600 miles of driving per year or 65 percent of their normal driving, whichever is less. With us 65 percent of normal driving would be less and we secured B ration coupons from the local rationing board for our five salesmen which range from 43 to 62 percent of their driving for last year which we do not feel is 'too liberal.'

"As to tire rationing and inspection, everybody that I have talked to thinks it is absolutely ridiculous to have to make these periodical inspections of tires and pay the amounts required by Office of Price Administration for such inspections as I am quite sure that a lot of these inspectors will make a racket of the program.

"Most of the garages, filling stations, and tire dealers are extremely short-handed trying to keep the cars running without foisting this job of tire inspection on them. Perhaps Office of Price Administration or McNutt will furnish the necessary labor to perform these periodical tire inspections."

Ray Thompson, Walcott, N. Dak.:

"The gas rationing regarding farm passenger cars is working reasonably well, so far. Most boards have been generous to farmers, and have given C mileage lavishly. Tires are in a different situation, although perhaps as well as can be expected.

"But the farm-truck program is the sore-spot of the whole gas situation. We have insufficient mileage, not enough gasoline, and the Office of Defense Transportation local requirements cripple the 'around the farm' operations of the smaller trucks. Example: I am putting in wheat a mile from home. I need gas, oil for tractor, seed for the drill, etc. Do I use my pick-up truck or shall I take 5 times as long and go with the tractor? The Office of Defense Transportation says I can't haul less than 1 ton per round trip, 20 gallons of gas and a pail of grease are a long way from a ton. Maybe I better farm a quarter less and quit raising so many hogs.

"That is farmer psychology. The Government does not want him to drop that extra quarter and quit raising hogs. But the farmer, by his very nature, is not one to go along with red tape and restrictions. How could he farm and comply with them all? Why can't Washington see that if they want to have large production in the face of farm labor shortage, that they should cease and desist from pestering to hampering him?"

"Why should tractor gas be rationed? Do they think we'll go joyriding on tractors? I know that many, many farmers are going to cut down seriously. 'Let 'er lay' and 'Let 'em farm it themselves.' That's the wrong attitude, and we don't want that, but the Federal Government is asking for it. None of the farmers want soldiers to go hungry but we've heard about wheat and corn surpluses for so long, we don't believe there is an actual shortage. I don't believe it myself if they wouldn't try to feed half the rest of the world.

"As a farmer I suggest taking off restrictions of every kind from the farm truck and tractor. Let his car be controlled with everybody else, but don't bother the tools of production.

"P. S.: I personally know of farmers who have been allotted 10 gallons of gas for this 3-month period for a pick-up truck, and of others who have been making 8 to 10 thousand miles per year and have been cut to 3,100. Also I know of one man who doesn't use his truck in the winter outside of a load of coal or two who has to drive 25 miles every 60 days to get his tires inspected. He told me that he would make more miles for tire inspections than he would use the truck from December 15 to February 15. Another farmer had trouble getting his hogs to market at West Fargo because he doesn't own a truck, and his neighbors didn't want to use up their own precious allotments to haul his hogs. You can imagine how baffled he was."

Howard Boyd, Wheatland, N. Dak.:

"I have considerable to say. As a beginning, the mileage allowance as sent out by the Detroit Office of Defense Transportation office were so ridiculously out of line they were not even funny. E. g.: I have a one-half ton pick-up as an only means of transportation and was allowed 3,100 miles per year. This mileage is figured on 15 miles per gallon of gas. That would be possible without a load on a good road but when trucking snow and mud, with or without a load, it is hopelessly out of line. Then there are some instances of applicants getting plenty of gas, a few even more than asked for. It has also been noticed that large truckers are getting unlimited gas which adds up to an effort to force the farmer to hire his hauling done (this would build up great truck lines and would mean monopolistic commercial transportation under Government control).

"Another thing: I have made two trips to Fargo regarding this ration business and I have no idea how many more times I will need to go (75 miles per trip) before I am through. It sure saves tires and gas.

"The feeling is growing that while gas rationing may be desirable and necessary, why—oh, why—can't we have some sane and sensible administration? If the powers that be don't see the light before they ration tractor gas it will be a national calamity and I don't mean maybe. No farmer can farm without plenty of fuel (and has no time to unwind miles of red tape to get it), and isn't going to try very long. I feel safe in saying that the idiotic rationing administration is driving more farmers to quit in disgust and by next year food rationing will be a national necessity."

Carl Siverts, proprietor, Grain and Live Stock, Ash Coulee Ranch, Dodge, N. Dak.:

"I operate a combination cattle ranch and grain farm, consisting of 3,360 acres, of which I cultivate about 500 acres. Due to good competent help being hard to get of late years, I was obliged to sell off most of my horses and purchase power farm equipment in order to get the work done with less help. Now that so many of our boys are being drafted for armed service, it has been almost impossible to get any help this past year. In fact, during the year 1942 I have been alone on the place about two-thirds of the time, and in spite of this, by working night and day I managed to market over 100,000 pounds of beef, 5,000 pounds of hogs, and about $1,000 in cream, eggs, and poultry, so you can readily see that I haven't found much time for joy riding. I am 55 years old and getting to the age where I am not as able to put in long days like I used to, but as long as we are expected to produce food to feed the world, I am more than willing to continue to do my bit.

"I have a car that we use for what little family driving we find time to do and use a half-ton pick-up truck for hauling produce, and general farm trucking.

"When I applied for my Office of Defense Transportation certificate for my farm truck I gave all the information I could on my driving requirements in connection with the operation of my ranch and when the certificate was issued to me it allowed me a maximum mileage for the year of 717 miles for the farm truck. As my business takes me to a half dozen towns ranging from 15 miles the nearest to 50 miles the largest, you can see that 717 miles per year is inadequate. In fact, I use the truck hauling feed, seed, and general driving around the ranch and this alone will exceed the maximum allowance granted by the Office of Defense Transportation Board and makes no provisions for hauling grain and produce to market.

"I am wintering 175 head of cattle with the intention to continue raising beef, pork, grain, and produce, but if the Government is going to tie me down so that I cannot get enough gas to attend to the necessary driving in connection with my farm and ranching operations, I have only one alternative, and that is to sell out and retire. I can sell out, pay all my debts, and still have enough left to retire on, and that is just what I will do unless some measures are taken by you gentlemen in Washington to remedy this situation. I think that you will agree with me in that one man operating a large farm and ranch like mine with one man to help about 4 months out of the year, that it doesn't give me much time to go joyriding and still attend to my work.

"I notice a lot of State and Federal employees driving around with C cards on their car and sometimes have my doubt about their driving being very essential to the war effort. Also beer and liquor trucks as well as tobacco trucks, so if these industries are essential to the successful prosecution of the war, I would think that raising food should be that more important.

"There are hundreds of thousands of farmers and stockmen in the same position as I am in, all willing to continue to work a few more years in order to provide food for our people, but if we are going to be hamstrung by curtailment of items vitally necessary in order to produce this food, we have no other choice but to fold up and call it quits.

"I hope the injustices imposed on the people out here in the farming area in connection with the gasoline rationing can be remedied. We are not asking for one single gallon of gas for pleasure riding, nor do we feel that there is any time for anyone doing any joy riding for the duration, but we do ask that we are given the necessary supplies to produce all the food we can.

"P. S.: If anyone should doubt the statements as to labor available, acres farmed, number of cattle fed and sold, I will gladly substantiate this under oath."

Carl A. Braun, M. & B. Petroleum Co., Mayville, N. Dak.:

"It is my opinion the complete rationing set-up appears to be very inefficient. Citing my own experience, it was necessary for me to make five trips to the county seat, 20 miles away, to obtain a few coupons and blanks that could have been handled locally, thus saving approximately one-half day of my time each trip, say nothing of the waste of tires and gasoline. This being only my experience, others the same. Furthermore, the great amount of additional book work and extra clerical work needed to comply with the rationing set-up is unnecessary, and the large business as well as the small are holding this type of help from defense jobs where they, too, could be of a benefit to the war effort. The small as well as the large business would have more money for which to pay additional taxes and buy bonds.

"It is disgusting to think a certain Washington official continues to insist that a special group are paying to avert gasoline rationing in the Midwest.

"I have yet to hear the first objection to gasoline rationing by any major company, as today they are blessed with more Government contracts than they can fill. Naturally, when they can sell all the gasoline they can manufacture at prices from 12 to 15 cents per gallon to the Government, why should they want to take care of the small farmers and small users in our State, when they can only get 6 cents f. o. b. refinery? Yet their attitude is that of selfishness; if they cannot have all, they will see no one else gets it. I have reference to the many Montana refineries who are not fortunate enough either financially or have the necessary equipment and are too far away to bid on Government contracts. Yet they are able to supply our State and neighboring States with all the gasoline that is needed to take care of our requirements."

Ulrich Buchli, Hebron, N. Dak.:

"Bill, what do you think of our rationing situation, especially with the gas rationing that came into effect now? It makes it plenty tough for us that live out in the country, driving 13 miles one way; and then another thing, when a person has to go before the rationing board and then to beg for more gas and, another thing, for every application we make we have to go to Mandan where, on the other hand, we are supposed to save gas and tires; it just doesn't work out. It came in the paper that Congress was extending the rationing for 90 days, and then over the radio came that Roosevelt ordered Jeffers to go ahead with the rationing. I don't see that our Congress has anything to say what the people want and need. I only hope, when the new Congress meets after January 1, to put the brakes on a lot of red tape that we have to go through."

C. W. Graves, secretary-treasurer and general manager, Northern Packing Co., Grand Forks, N. Dak.:

"With reference to gas and tire rationing as it is working out in North Dakota. Of course such a radical readjustment as was required could not help but cause rather grave inconvenience, and the writer has heard of a number of instances that were manifestly unfair. But on the whole there is no rebellion. The main trouble seems to have been the method used and the extremely complicated conditions. Possibly Mr. Henderson leaving the administration may tend to help adjustment; and I note in recent news dispatches that Jeffery has recommended that the farmer be cared for up to their full needs until April the first when new regulations can be worked out. What North Dakota must have is sufficient gas (and only sufficient) to do its farm work and to move its products into the centers.

"Personally, the writer is inclined to believe that this country is so large and its interests so diverse that it would be almost impossible to direct in detail what is to be done, by Washington bureaus. What the country needs is to be told what is necessary to do and I am quite sure, as doubtless you are, that North Dakota will cooperate fully. This will come about because North Dakota is contributing fully to the armed forces, and our people want to do what will help their boys the most.

"NOTE.—This is an important letter on N. D.'s incomes and taxes to be paid; on army."

George Crites, Crites Oil Co., Lisbon, N. Dak.:

"There is entirely too much red tape on tractor gas rationing. I would like to have a chance to exchange ideas with someone who has charge of the program. I have some ideas that would make it easier for the Government, the farmer, and the oil men. As far as cars go everyone around here seems to be pretty well taken care of. The questionnaires were too tough for the average fellow to make out and it put a lot of extra work on us."

A. J. Brandt, Fargo, N. Dak.:

"Regarding conditions existing up here with the gas rationing in effect, most people have used up their allotment for this period and just cannot go on. If one gets seriously ill in one of these small towns (you know doctors are few and far between in this country) and has to go from 25 to 100 miles to reach a doctor he probably will not have enough gasoline to serve his needs and by the time he finds a neighbor with a sufficient amount of gasoline it probably would be too late.

"The farmer being cut short it hurts business. And, after all, if our Government depends upon our farmers to raise a great share of the food needed to feed our soldiers and European countries, they should make allowances for extra gas so that they, the farmers, can get to town. In turn, this keeps our merchants, machine shops, and blacksmiths alive through these slack months, so that when spring comes they will be on the job when an emergency arises—a break-down. People in this North country cannot go out in their back yards and pick vegetables, yeast, or other necessary items more than 3 months of the year. It is just too cold (it is 10° below zero this a. m., with a foot of snow on the level). You realize that every farmer is trying to use all of his old machinery so as not to buy any new machinery as a war measure (we are all patriotic out here). You know as well as I do that this old machinery is going to have more break-downs and need more replacements than a new machine. The farmer just has to go to town to get his machinery repaired.

"I just learned of a blacksmith that burned out at Sabin, Minn. He was going to leave for defense work, but the merchants and farmers got together, bought him a new outfit, and started him in business—they needed that blacksmith. In reality, he is a defense worker. We have to have this farm machinery in working order to raise the food the Government is asking for, and we need gasoline to get these parts to the repairman and back to the farm. You cannot wait until the ration board allows gas for this, as the planting season will soon be here. I called the office of the Share-Your-Car Club and asked them to write you. I am enclosing a certified copy of statements issued by various firms as to their gas requirements and the amount allotted them. There is quite a difference. Too much to be healthy. You know, BILL, there is no pleasure driving in this country at this time of the year—it is too damn cold."

Aug. H. Seidel, Jr., Cathay, N. Dak.:

"We in this community are not at all satisfied; we must make too many trips to town to get something done. I have made 4 trips to town for my A card, or 108 miles (always something wrong); 2 trips for tractor fuel, or 42 miles; 2 trips for truck; and I do not know how many more for tractor gas and truck gas. If you want or must have a tire, you have to make from 4 to 7 trips to town. Then they at the board tell you you overlooked your truck tires and cannot get a new tire; you must meet them personally and state your case. Now, I think this is the board's fault. They, the board, tell you they do not know how to fill out the blanks; to go to some lawyer, which costs us extra; and if we fill out the blanks ourselves, they send them back, stating that we filled them out wrong. They are either ignorant or stubborn. We do not want to make any more miles than is necessary; we want to save gas and rubber. But how can we with such inefficiency? Some people live 20 to 25 miles from town; look at Milloy and Gus. We go once a week to town regular, or 34 miles round trip. Some people live farther, some closer, but all get 4 gallons per week; for farmer living 1 or 2 or 3 miles is O. K., but not 15 to 25 miles. I do not know how this can be regulated, except by local community * * * just a farmer."

Albert Kuball, manager, Farmers' Union Oil Co., Fessenden, N. Dak.:

"My personal opinion of gas rationing is that it is the most cussed thing that ever happened to us all in North Dakota, especially to us dealers. We have so much red tape to contend with that we must have extra help to do the red-tape job and do not get anything for it to pay our help. Last month my income was $50 less than I had to pay my help and then I did not get a dime out of it for myself as manager, to feed my family. This cannot go on for very long, or it will hamper the farm production as well as the war. There absolutely is no sense in having all the red tape connected with this rationing here in North Dakota; the farmers must have so much gasoline to do their jobs and why in hell penalize the dealer by making him work day and night for foolishness. The farmers are sick about it, and we as dealers are more than sick about it all—to spend our valuable time trying to explain and cannot do just justice to our regular business. I have talked to many of the oil dealers and they too are all sick about it as I am, and I hope something can be done about it as soon as possible.

"Many farmers have already quit farming and many, many more will, if this red tape keeps on. The draft boards take their boys that are needed here to help, and many have to sell their farm, machinery, cattle, and sheep, and go. I have a sale bill right in front of me here in my office of such a case. (Something screwy somewhere). We all want to do our very best to win this war but it seems to me, it is done backward. People are getting disgusted and that is not good for our future. Please try and correct some of this if possible."

Wes Keller, vice president, Truax-Traer Coal Co., Minot, N. Dak.:

"As to tire rationing and inspection, everybody that I have talked to thinks it is absolutely ridiculous to have to make these periodical inspections of tires and pay the amounts required by Office of Price Administration for such inspections as I am quite sure that a lot of these inspectors will make a racket of the program.

"Most of the garages, filling stations, and tire dealers are extremely short-handed trying to keep the cars running without foisting this job of tire inspection on them. Perhaps Office of Price Administration or McNutt will furnish the necessary labor to perform these periodical tire inspections."

Berlin Boyd, manager, Bismarck Association of Commerce, Bismarck, N. Dak.:

"From all the information I have been able to get locally the majority of gasoline users in this area seem to be pretty well satisfied with the way the tire and gasoline rationing programs are being handled here.

"There was some confusion at the outset, particularly among the farmers who used their passenger cars with trailers to haul livestock and produce into town and supplies back home. However, this matter was called to the attention of the State Office of Price Administration board and rectified immediately and from all reports our local board is using good judgment and making a sincere effort to approve sufficient gasoline for essential needs of farmers and business organizations."

Ray Thompson, Richland County Republican chairman, Walcott, N. Dak.:

"I am writing you regarding the gasoline and rubber situation from a farmer's viewpoint. The gas rationing regarding farm passenger cars is working reasonably well so far. Most boards have been generous to farmers and have given C mileage lavishly. Tires are in a different situation, although perhaps as well as can be expected.

"But the farm truck program is the sore spot of the whole gas situation. We have insufficient mileage, not enough gasoline, and the Office of Defense Transportation load requirements cripple the 'around the farm' operations of the smaller trucks. You can imagine how baffled he was."

Robert Gooden, Drayton, N. Dak.:

"I think if we all do our part it is going to work out good. There was a notice came out in the mail today that was being held a meeting for the purpose of enlarging our allowance. I am afraid I have this wrong, since I have looked at the notice again the meeting is to get an estimate of how much fuel of all kinds we think we will need this season. But I think anyone can get more if he can show that his demands are essential. Everybody seems satisfied and cooperating."

SUGGESTIONS FOR SENATE COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hand a memorandum which I have prepared, which contains three suggestions for the Committee on Rules. It was recently my privilege to be appointed a member of that committee, but so far the committee has had no meetings. I ask that the proposed suggestions be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum of suggestions is as follows:

1. The Senate presiding officer should be required to state the motion whenever a vote—whether it is a voice vote or a roll-call vote—is taken. In other words, the presiding officer should not merely say the motion is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. He should identify the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Moreover, the principal motions and, in fact, all motions should be completely identified with a statement of exactly what their intent may be. This will, of course, appear in the RECORD and will greatly facilitate the use of the RECORD.

As it is at the present time, a Senator who has been absent is required to, in some cases, read through a number of pages of the RECORD before he can find out what a particular motion was. The effectiveness of the RECORD as a reference source would be immeasurably increased by the adoption of this rule.

Moreover, this procedure would be of tremendous value to Senators on the floor, particularly those Senators who may happen to come in just prior to a vote without having had the benefit of the previous discussion, in which case they are compelled to question other Senators as to precisely what the motion implies.

2. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should list all of the committee hearings and committee meetings scheduled for the following day. This would be an invaluable ready reference for all Members of the Senate. Frequently, hearings are conducted which may be of particular interest to some Senator who may not happen to be a Member of that particular committee and hence may not receive a notice of the meeting. The listing of these hearings and meetings in the RECORD would make it possible for each Senator to be advised as to all meetings which are scheduled.

3. Official United States Treasury Department balance sheets are sent to every Member of Congress. I think it would serve a very constructive purpose, particularly in these days of astronomical spending, if the totals involved in our balance sheet were inserted daily in the RECORD, so that each legislator would continually have before him the exact financial condition of our country.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to read the third suggestion into the RECORD, and comment very briefly upon it. It is as follows:

3. Official United States Treasury Department balance sheets are sent to every Member of Congress. I think it would serve a very constructive purpose, particularly in these days of astronomical spending, if the totals involved in our balance sheet were inserted daily in the RECORD—so that each legislator would continually have before him the exact financial condition of our country.

As every Senator knows, the Budget provides for $109,000,000,000, $9,000,000,000 of which is the estimated overhead cost of government, and $3,000,000,000 the cost of interest. That leaves $97,000,000,000. That amount is broken down into various items as follows: Munitions, $66,000,000,000; government overhead, $9,000,000,000; military and civilian overhead, $21,000,000,000; interest, $3,000,000,000; industrial construction, $2,000,000,000; other construction, $5,000,000,000; lend-lease, $3,000,000,000, until we get a $66,000,000,000 balance, which is supposed to be used for munitions. Yet, Mr. President, it has been stated by the best authority in this country that the maximum amount which the country can produce in munitions through its industries is some $30,000,000,000. That leaves $36,000,000,000 which has not been accounted for in that respect.

Mr. President, the country has been thrilled, of course, by the recent action of the President. It has undoubtedly performed a great function in strengthening the morale of the peoples of the earth and the people of this country. But the American people have their eyes on that $109,000,000,000, as the letters which come to our desks indicate, and they are expecting that the Congress shall keep its eye on the ball. They do not want any more reckless, almost criminal, spending.

Mr. President, I have in mind a letter which came to my desk last Saturday. One of the commentators had mentioned an incident of someone selling a gold brick to the Government. The writer of the letter asked, "Are we expected to buy bonds when deals like this go on?"

I agree that it was a small item, but the morale of the people is tied up with the economics of the country, and the future of the country is tied up as well with its economics.

Mr. President, I believe that it would be well if, at the end of that part of the RECORD which shows the Senate proceedings, there were to be shown for each day the Senate is in session the balance as indicated, by the Treasury.

AID TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, toward the end of the last session of the Congress I introduced a bill to aid small independent businesses of the country by the collection and dissemination of knowledge of business management and its application to specific problems and opportunities, in order that the American system of free enterprise may be strengthened, and that individual small businesses may be continued at a profit both to the businessman and to the community. The bill would give aid to small business through the extension of the field service of the Department of Commerce. The bill declared it—to be the policy of the United States to maintain small independent businesses of the country, to improve their efficiency through improved management methods, to aid them in contributing their utmost to the national welfare, to expand the opportunities for such classes of enterprises, and assure the economic stability of the Nation.

Mr. President, on January 14 of this year I reintroduced the bill S. 356, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I shall shortly ask the committee for hearings. The bill, in my judgment, is very necessary, particularly at this time.

The economic ailments from which small businessmen in the United States are suffering cannot be cured by absent treatment. Too many small business firms are far too ill to go to the doctor. The doctor must go to them. It is for this reason that I have reintroduced the bill which I presented at the close of the last session of Congress to give aid to small business through the extension of the field service of the Department of Commerce. I trust the bill will receive the approval of the Senate early in the present session.

The Government has for many years been rendering to the farmers of the United States the same sort of service proposed in the bill, and we all know that this similar type of service has been of tremendous benefit to agriculture. We should have provided this service for small businessmen many years ago. It would be criminal for us not to do so at this time when many experts tell us that the mortality rate in the field of small business will be very high unless some means are found of preventing this economic epidemic.

Mr. President, it is certainly vital to the war effort that the existing channels of distribution be kept in operation. We must keep wholesalers, retailers, and other small businessmen going, or our distributing system will be greatly injured. We must, however, give the small businessman practical advice. As matters now stand it is very difficult for him to obtain this sort of information. He can write to his Representatives in Congress and to Government agencies, but the specific individual problems which are confronting him, and which seem to him to be insurmountable, are hard to put into a letter, and equally hard for the recipient of such a letter to understand.

The proposed arrangements with educational institutions, as developed in the provisions of my bill, would permit the Department of Commerce to subcontract special research questions, thus utilizing existing facilities and talents without increasing the permanent research staff of the Department.

The Department of Commerce already has a field service, known as the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, so that, as an organization in the field, it can carry forward the policy enunciated in the bill.

The Department of Commerce also has trained men and a very large amount of information collected by the Bureau of the Census and other agencies, all of which would be invaluable if it could be placed at the disposal of small businessmen.

Mr. President, my bill is designed to grant the Department of Commerce sufficient authority and personnel to decentralize this big problem, using the established field services of the Department as a nucleus for the work. It may not be possible under this program for representatives of the Department of Commerce to contact every businessman in need of information, in need of advice, in need of engineering services, in need of counsel on business practices, but it will be possible to make these services readily accessible. Almost any small businessman can reach his State capital, or one of the leading cities of his State, while very few of them have time or money to come to Washington.

So, Mr. President, my bill would increase the activity of the Department of Commerce and grant it additional authority in the field of small enterprise. The Department has the system in the field already set up. It has the information collected by the Census Bureau and by other agencies of the Government, and it can bring to little business that service which big business is able to purchase for itself. In my judgment, it would aid small business very materially. It would inform the Congress of the difficulties of small business. It would result in housing in the Department of Commerce an appropriate agency to handle a situation which that Department of Government was originally created to deal with.

The one big question and problem in the field of business is the survival of small business. It is fundamentally connected with the survival of our own way of life. So, Mr. President, during the present session I shall bring to the attention of the Senate the progress of this bill, and I hope that all Senators interested in the well-being and the progress of small business, as I am sure they are all interested, will lend me their support and their cooperation to the end that we may do something of very material substance insofar as small business is concerned. The proposed legislation will be before the Committee on Commerce. Hearings will be held, I am sure, in the very near future, and the interest of my colleagues in the Chamber will be deeply appreciated.

FOOD PRODUCTION FOR THE WAR

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there came to my desk today, from the United States Department of Agriculture, a very significant piece of information. We have heard a great deal lately about the threat to our food supply. The information to which I refer, Mr. President, shows that for the week ending Thursday, January 21, 1943, cheese production in this country is down 24 percent as compared with the corresponding week last year. For the preceding week, cheese production was down 20 percent.

Mr. President, we all know what that means. If cheese production is down, what is the situation with respect to other items? We know that in many places, particularly in Washington, we cannot procure a great many items of ordinary food, such as beef. If a week ago cheese production was down 20 percent, and for the week ending January 21 it was down 24 percent, where are we heading? Are we not in the position which was prophesied some time ago of the Government talking about aiding the farmer, but doing nothing to aid him?

Already we notice in the newspapers another campaign more or less to blame the farmer. There are three causes for the present situation. The first cause is that the farmer has not been able to obtain the necessary labor. It has been taken from him by competing industrial plants and by the Army.

In the second place, until recently, the farmer was not able to obtain adequate machinery, and he will not be able to obtain it until the manufacture of farm machinery is increased.

In the third place—and I say this because of the misrepresentation which is abroad in the land—the farmer has not been receiving adequate prices. Irrespective, Mr. President, of what you and I pay, the farmer has not been receiving adequate prices for his products.

I am not speaking merely for the farmer. I am speaking for 131,000,000 Americans who are asked to curtail their consumption of food in order that our armed forces and our allies may receive necessary food to keep the battle going.

Last year I called attention to the fact that it was imperative that an effort should be made to see that sufficient proper manpower was made available to the farmer for the spring work. I stated then that we should probably have to organize the boys and girls in the high schools, as well as professional men in the villages, and that many businessmen would have to close their places of business in order to assist in and go to the farms to provide adequate labor. Just the other day Mr. Landis, in Washington, suggested the same idea.

What has the Government done in order to effectuate that purpose? Has it expected the people to carry out the program on their own initiative? The answer is—as was suggested by a distinguished Senator only recently—that the Government is transferring a group of submarginal farmers from West Virginia and Kentucky and expecting them to go into the dairy business in my State and elsewhere to do the work required to be done.

I believe that such action will be of some assistance; but, Mr. President, this is our job. The situation is so serious that 6 or 8 months from now, when we really start to ration America, we shall feel the repercussion of it in the Senate.

I suggest that we get busy now and take action to see to it that the farmer is supplied with the labor necessary to produce the required quantity of food for our people at home, as well as for our allies and our armed forces.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CHINA — RELINQUISHMENT OF EXTRATERRITORIAL RIGHTS IN CHINA

Mr. CONNALLY. The President of the United States has this day transmitted to the Senate a treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of China providing for the relinquishment of extraterritorial rights in China and the regulation of related matters, signed at Washington, January 11, 1943. I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the treaty, so that it may be published.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The treaty, with the accompanying supplementary notes, is as follows:

EXECUTIVE A, SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA FOR THE RELINQUISHMENT OF EXTRATERRITORIAL RIGHTS IN CHINA AND THE REGULATION OF RELATED MATTERS

The United States of America and the Republic of China, desirous of emphasizing the friendly relations which have long prevailed between their two peoples and of manifesting their common desire as equal and sovereign States that the high principles in the regulation of human affairs to which they are committed shall be made broadly effective, have resolved to conclude a treaty for the purpose of adjusting certain matters in the relations of the two countries, and have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America,

Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States of America, and

The President of the National Government of the Republic of China,

Dr. Wei Tao-ming, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the Republic of China to the United States of America;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

Article I

All those provisions of treaties or agreements in force between the United States of America and the Republic of China which authorize the Government of the United States of America or its representatives to exercise jurisdiction over nationals of the United States of America in the territory of the Republic of China are hereby abrogated. Nationals of the United States of America in such territory shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Government of the Republic of China in accordance with the principles of international law and practice.

Article II

The Government of the United States of America considers that the Final Protocol concluded at Peking on September 7, 1901, between the Chinese Government and other governments, including the Government of the United States of America, should be terminated and agrees that the rights accorded to the Government of the United States of America under that Protocol and under agreements supplementary thereto shall cease.

The Government of the United States of America will cooperate with the Government of the Republic of China for the reaching of any necessary agreements with other governments concerned for the transfer to the Government of the Republic of China of the administration and control of the Diplomatic Quarter at Peiping, including the official assets and the official obligations of the Diplomatic Quarter, it being mutually understood that the Government of the Republic of China in taking over administration and control of the Diplomatic Quarter will make provision for the assumption and discharge of the official obligations and liabilities of the Diplomatic Quarter and for the recognition and protection of all legitimate rights therein.

The Government of the Republic of China hereby accords to the Government of the United States of America a continued right to use for official purposes the land which has been allocated to the Government of the United States of America in the Diplomatic Quarter in Peiping, on parts of which are located buildings belonging to the Government of the United States of America.

Article III

The Government of the United States of America considers that the International Settlements at Shanghai and Amoy should revert to the administration and control of the Government of the Republic of China and agrees that the rights accorded to the Government of the United States of America in relation to those Settlements shall cease.

The Government of the United States of America will cooperate with the Government of the Republic of China for the reaching of any necessary agreements with other governments concerned for the transfer to the Government of the Republic of China of the administration and control of the International Settlements at Shanghai and Amoy, including the official assets and the official obligations of those settlements, it being mutually understood that the Government of the Republic of China in taking over administration and control of those Settlements will make provision for the assumption and discharge of the official obligations and liabilities of those Settlements and for the recognition and protection of all legitimate rights therein.

Article IV

In order to obviate any questions as to existing rights in respect of or as to existing titles to real property in territory of the Republic of China possessed by nationals (including corporations or associations), or by the Government, of the United States of America, particularly questions which might arise from the abrogation of the provisions of treaties or agreements as stipulated in Article I, it is agreed that such existing rights or titles shall be indefeasible and shall not be questioned upon any ground except upon proof, established through due process of law, of fraud or of fraudulent or other dishonest practices in the acquisition of such rights or titles, it being understood that no right or title shall be rendered invalid by virtue of any subsequent change in the official procedure through which it was acquired. It is also agreed that these rights or titles shall be subject to the laws and regulations of the Republic of China concerning taxation, national defense, and the right of eminent domain, and that no such rights or titles may be alienated to the government or nationals (including corporations or associations) of any third country without the express consent of the Government of the Republic of China.

It is also agreed that if it should be the desire of the Government of the Republic of China to replace, by new deeds of ownership, existing leases in perpetuity or other documentary evidence relating to real property held by nationals, or by the Government, of the United States of America, the replacement shall be made by the Chinese authorities without charges of any sort and the new deeds of ownership shall fully protect the holders of such leases or other documentary evidence and their legal heirs and assigns without diminution of their prior rights and interests, including the right of alienation.

It is further agreed that nationals or the Government of the United States of America shall not be required or asked by the Chinese authorities to make any payments of fees in connection with land transfers for or with relation to any period prior to the effective date of this treaty.

Article V

The Government of the United States of America having long accorded rights to nationals of the Republic of China within the territory of the United States of America to travel, reside and carry on trade throughout the whole extent of that territory, the Government of the Republic of China agrees to accord similar rights to nationals of the United States of America within the territory of the Republic of China. Each of the two Governments will endeavor to have accorded in territory under its jurisdiction to nationals of the other country, in regard to all legal proceedings, and to matters relating to the administration of justice, and to the levying of taxes or requirements in connection therewith, treatment not less favorable than that accorded to its own nationals.

Article VI

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China mutually agree that the consular officers of each country, duly provided with exequaturs, shall be permitted to reside in such ports, places and cities as may be agreed upon. The consular officers of each country shall have the right to interview, to communicate with, and to advise nationals of their country within their consular districts; they shall be informed immediately whenever nationals of their country are under detention or arrest or in prison or are awaiting trial in their consular districts and they shall, upon notification to the appropriate authorities, be permitted to visit any such nationals; and, in general, the consular officers of each country shall be accorded the rights, privileges, and immunities enjoyed by consular officers under modern international usage.

It is likewise agreed that the nationals of each country, in the territory of the other country, shall have the right at all times to communicate with the consular officers of their country. Communications to their consular officers from nationals of each country who are under detention or arrest or in prison or are awaiting trial in the territory of the other country shall be forwarded to such consular officers by the local authorities.

Article VII

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China mutually agree that they will enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a comprehensive modern treaty of friendship, commerce, navigation and consular rights, upon the request of either Government or in any case within six months after the cessation of the hostilities in the war against the common enemies in which they are now engaged. The treaty to be thus negotiated will be based upon the principles of international law and practice as reflected in modern international procedures and in the modern treaties which the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China respectively have in recent years concluded with other governments.

Pending the conclusion of a comprehensive treaty of the character referred to in the preceding paragraph, if any questions affecting the rights in territory of the Republic of China of nationals (including corporations or associations), or of the Government, of the United States of America should arise in future and if these questions are not covered by the present treaty, or by the provisions of existing treaties, conventions, or agreements between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China not abrogated by or inconsistent with this treaty, such questions shall be discussed by representatives of the two Governments and shall be decided in accordance with generally accepted principles of international law and with modern international practice.

Article VIII

The present treaty shall come into force on the day of the exchange of ratifications.

The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

Signed and sealed in the English and Chinese languages, both equally authentic, in duplicate, at Washington, this eleventh day of January, one thousand nine hundred forty-three, corresponding to the eleventh day of the first month of the thirty-second year of the Republic of China.

SUPPLEMENTARY EXCHANGE OF NOTES

CHINESE EMBASSY,
Washington, January 11, 1943.

Hon. CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State.

EXCELLENCY: Under instruction of my Government, I have the honor to state that in connection with the treaty signed today by the Government of the Republic of China and the Government of the United States of America, in which the Government of the United States of America relinquishes its extraterritorial and related special rights in China, it is the understanding of the Government of the Republic of China that the rights of the Government of the United States of America and of its nationals in regard to the systems of treaty ports and of special courts in the International Settlements at Shanghai and Amoy and in regard to the employment of foreign pilots in the ports of the territory of China are also relinquished. In the light of the abolition of treaty ports as such, it is understood that all coastal ports in the territory of the Republic of China which are normally open to American overseas merchant shipping will remain open to such shipping after the coming into effect of the present treaty and the accompanying exchange of notes.

It is mutually agreed that the merchant vessels of each country shall be permitted freely to come to the ports, places, and waters of the other country which are or may be open to overseas merchant shipping, and that the treatment accorded to such vessels in such ports, places, and waters shall be no less favorable than that accorded to national vessels and shall be as favorable as that accorded to the vessels of any third country.

It is mutually understood that the Government of the United States of America relinquishes the special rights which vessels of the United States of America have been accorded with regard to the coasting trade and inland navigation in the waters of the Republic of China and that the Government of the Republic of China is prepared to take over any American properties that may have been engaged for those purposes and to pay adequate compensation therefor. Should either country accord the rights of inland navigation or coasting trade to vessels of any third country such rights would similarly be accorded to the vessels of the other country. The coasting trade and inland navigation of each country are excepted from the requirement of national treatment and are to be regulated according to the laws of each country in relation thereto. It is agreed, however, that vessels of either country shall enjoy within the territory of the other country with respect to the coasting trade and inland navigation treatment as favorable as that accorded to the vessels of any third country.

It is mutually understood that the Government of the United States of America relinquishes the special rights which naval vessels of the United States of America have been accorded in the waters of the Republic of China and that the Government of the Republic of China and the Government of the United States of America shall extend to each other the mutual courtesy of visits by their warships in accordance with international usage and comity.

It is mutually understood that questions which are not covered by the present treaty and exchange of notes and which may affect the sovereignty of the Republic of China shall be discussed by representatives of the two Governments and shall be decided in accordance with generally accepted principles of international law and with modern international practice.

With reference to article IV of the treaty, the Government of the Republic of China hereby declares that the restriction on the right of alienation of existing rights or titles to real property referred to in that article will be applied by the Chinese authorities in an equitable manner and that if and when the Chinese Government declines to give assent to a proposed transfer the Chinese Government will, in a spirit of justice and with a view to precluding loss on the part of American nationals whose interests are affected, undertake, if the American party in interest so desires, to take over the right or title in question and to pay adequate compensation therefor.

It is mutually understood that the orders, decrees, judgments, decisions, and other acts of the United States Court for China and of the consular courts of the United States of America in China shall be considered as res judicata and shall, when necessary, be enforced by the Chinese authorities. It is further understood that any cases pending before the United States Court for China and the consular courts of the United States of America in China at the time of the coming into effect of this treaty shall, if the plaintiff or petitioner so desires, be remitted to the appropriate courts of the Government of the Republic of China which shall proceed as expeditiously as possible with their disposition and in so doing shall insofar as practicable apply the laws of the United States of America.

It is understood that these agreements and understandings if confirmed by your Excellency's Government shall be considered as forming an integral part of the treaty signed today and shall be considered as effective upon the date of the entrance into force of that treaty.

I shall be much obliged if your Excellency will confirm the foregoing.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to Your Excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

WEI TAO-MING.

"It is mutually understood that the Government of the United States of America relinquishes the special rights which naval vessels of the United States of America have been accorded in the waters of the Republic of China and that the Government of the Republic of China and the Government of the United States of America shall extend to each other the mutual courtesy of visits by their warships in accordance with international usage and comity.

"It is mutually understood that questions which are not covered by the present treaty and exchange of notes and which may affect the sovereignty of the Republic of China shall be discussed by representatives of the two Governments and shall be decided in accordance with generally accepted principles of international law and with modern international practice.

"With reference to article IV of the treaty, the Government of the Republic of China hereby declares that the restriction on the right of alienation of existing rights or titles to real property referred to in that article will be applied by the Chinese authorities in an equitable manner and that if and when the Chinese Government declines to give assent to a proposed transfer the Chinese Government will, in a spirit of justice and with a view to precluding loss on the part of American nationals whose interests are affected, undertake, if the American party in interest so desires, to take over the right or title in question and to pay adequate compensation therefor.

"It is mutually understood that the orders, decrees, judgments, decisions, and other acts of the United States Court for China and of the consular courts of the United States of America in China shall be considered as res judicata and shall, when necessary, be enforced by the Chinese authorities. It is further understood that any cases pending before the United States Court for China and the consular courts of the United States of America in China at the time of the coming into effect of this treaty shall, if the plaintiff or petitioner so desires, be remitted to the appropriate courts of the Government of the Republic of China which shall proceed as expeditiously as possible with their disposition and in so doing shall insofar as practicable apply the laws of the United States of America.

"It is understood that these agreements and understandings if confirmed by Your Excellency's government shall be considered as forming an integral part of the treaty signed today and shall be considered as effective upon the date of the entrance into force of that treaty.

"I shall be much obliged if Your Excellency will confirm the foregoing.

"I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to Your Excellency the assurances of my highest consideration."

I have the honor to confirm that the agreements and understandings which have been reached in connection with the treaty signed today by the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China are as set forth in the above note from Your Excellency.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to Your Excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

CORDELL HULL.

NOMINATION OF EDWARD J. FLYNN TO BE MINISTER TO AUSTRALIA

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
February 1, 1943.

To the Senate of the United States:

At his request, I withdraw the nomination of Edward J. Flynn, of New York, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Australia, which was sent to the Senate January 11, 1943.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement issued yesterday by Mr. Flynn in regard to his request that the nomination be withdrawn.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything in connection with this situation, but if the statement of Mr. Flynn is to be printed in the RECORD, I desire to comment upon it briefly, because I think the RECORD should be clear for the sake of history. I am referring particularly to some of the contents of the Flynn statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no desire to get into a controversy over what Mr. Flynn said in his statement.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There will be no controversy, but I wish to make a comment if the Flynn statement is to go into the RECORD. I shall make it for the sake of historical accuracy.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it is going to lead to any debate, I withdraw the request.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is immaterial to me, too.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Some of Mr. Flynn's comments require a parallel statement if the RECORD is to be accurate.

Mr. BARKLEY. For the moment, I withdraw the request.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD—NOMINATION OF JOSH LEE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the nomination on the Executive Calendar to the Civil Aeronautics Board.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Josh Lee to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I anticipated the withdrawal of the Flynn nomination this morning, and immediately conferred with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MOORE], who will oppose the confirmation of the nomination just read. He has advised me he is ready to proceed to the consideration of the nomination. Therefore I want the presence of the Senator noted before we take up the Lee nomination.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this nomination will probably lead to some discussion, we should have a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quroum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. WALLGREN] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senators from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY and Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] is detained in the West on official business for the Senate.

I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained because of a slight cold.

Mr. McNARY. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent on official business.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is unavoidably absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, in connection with my remarks in opposition to the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Josh Lee to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, I submit a copy of a letter which I wrote to the able chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. BAILEY] under date of January 13, 1943. The letter states some of the reasons why I oppose the nomination. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1943.

Senator JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BAILEY: Referring to the nomination of Josh Lee, of Oklahoma, as a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board in the Department of Commerce, that is pending before your committee for consideration, I beg to advise that I am opposed to his nomination and, therefore, would oppose confirmation by the Senate.

I am opposed to him for the reason that he is totally lacking in qualifications to fit him to be of service on that Board. His lack of qualifications for this position is a matter of common knowledge. His lack of qualifications is well known, in my opinion, by the Senators who have served with him. His lack of qualifications is well known in Oklahoma among the people who know him, and that is a very great many people. The people of Oklahoma, in my opinion, passed emphatic judgment on Josh Lee in the recent election regarding his suitability for public service.

I am very sure that the aviation industry, if it were free to express an opinion, would regard Senator Lee as totally unqualified for this important Board. The Board is important because it has to do with a broad field of aviation. It has to do with air routes, air fields, technical progress, and all sorts of features that require a technical knowledge. Whatever training Senator Lee may have had for public service, it certainly is not in the field of aviation. He is not a flyer, nor has he shown any particular confidence in aviation as a method of transportation. This is well known to the aviation industry. Since this is a regulatory board in the main, the aviation industry would be reluctant to testify before your committee concerning Senator Lee's fitness to serve efficiently upon the Board.

I am told that it has become a common practice on the part of both political parties to give preferential consideration for executive appointments to Senators who have been defeated by a vote of the people. Their fitness for the positions for which they are nominated is not very carefully scrutinized. What has grown to be known as senatorial courtesy has been persuasive in the minds of Senators of both parties in determining their votes. This so-called senatorial courtesy has, of course, some merit. It might be assumed, and very properly so, that a man who had served his country in the Senate should be given consideration for a further opportunity to be of service in public life, even though he had been defeated by the people of his own State. In the case of Senator Lee, I am of the opinion that the people of Oklahoma and many millions of people outside of the State of Oklahoma think that he has done a distinct disservice to his country. He has contributed substantially, while in the Congress, to the building up of a bureaucracy that is antagonistic to democratic institutions under the Constitution. He has been a willing advocate in the divesting of Congress of its constitutional powers and in the vesting of those powers in the executive department, which policy has done a great injury to the country and the country's government.

On principle, I am opposed to the appointment of a defeated Member of Congress to an office or a board created during his term in Congress. I would favor legislation prohibiting Members of Congress from being appointed to positions created during their terms for at least 2 years after they had retired from Congress, either voluntarily or involuntarily. I am reminded of the country-wide protest against pensions that were voted for Congress. That protest was so uniform and aggressive that Senator Lee himself advocated the repeal of this pension, or provision for civil-service-retirement benefits to the Members of the Congress of which he was a Member. Yet, as the law stands now, if Senator Lee were appointed to this position, he would be entitled to count all the years that he has been in Congress toward civil-service retirement, the same as he would have been if the so-called pension provision of the law had not been repealed.

I know of no reason why Senator Lee should not take his chances in a highly competitive situation in private industry, which has become distressingly infiltrated with bureaucracy and bureaucrats to the extent that to make a living in private enterprise today offers the most difficult problems in our American history.

I am making this protest against the confirmation of Senator Lee at the possible hazard of being construed as lacking in sympathy with the traditions, practices, and customs of the Senate, but I am doing it willingly, without any personal animosity toward Senator Lee and without fear of the consequences to me. I hope I may be considered to be making these objections in the interests of the general welfare.

With kindest regards, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

E. H. MOORE.

Mr. MOORE. I also submit a copy of an article concerning the appointment published in the January issue of United States Air Services magazine. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, since it bears upon the lack of suitability of former Senator Lee for the position for which he has been nominated.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MOORE. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to know whether or not the article which the Senator from Oklahoma has asked to have printed in the RECORD is to be adopted by him as a part of his remarks.

Mr. MOORE. I adopt it as a part of my remarks.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I believe that, in order that Senators may know what the Senator from Oklahoma is referring to, the article should be read rather than merely adopted as a part of the Senator's remarks. Otherwise Senators will not know what the Senator is referring to unless they have read the article.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOORE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest to the able Senator from Oklahoma that the clerk be requested to read the article to which he has referred.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, I adopt the suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read the article.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

WE HAD SUPPOSED THEY WERE MERELY JOSHING—WE BEG THE SENATE NOT TO CONFIRM THE APPOINTMENT

It has happened. Ex-Senator Josh Lee has been nominated as member of the Civil Aeronautics Board. Back in the middle thirties the agitation for legislation to establish a Federal regulatory body for the aviation activities of the country persistently stressed the desirability of a nonpolitical board in contradistinction to the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce then under the political aegis of "Rowboat" Johnson. "Rowboat" got his name because he wouldn't fly and his fame was more for smoking unusually strong pipes than for any particular abilities in aeronautical ways.

All of which brings to mind a well-remembered remark by Bill Stout, made when what later became the old Air Commerce Act of 1926 was first suggested. After Bill MacCracken and Clarence Young and others had strongly advocated the necessity for Federal regulation, Bill Stout said it would be all right with him so long as those gentlemen were the ones who handled it, for after all they were from within the group involved.

"Sooner or later," Bill went on, "the champion tobacco spitter of Kansas will be Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Air and then what will you have?"

Wichita at that time was the air center of the country, so Bill's choice of a State was not very politic. The Wichita boys resented the remark most strongly as a slur on the State, completely overlooking the meaning.

As it happens, Stout was only one State off on two occasions. First, it was the pipe-smoking champion of Missouri and now it's the God-knows-what champion of Oklahoma.

None of us in aviation knows the new member of the Civil Aeronautics Board. We do know that his record shows him to have been a rubber-stamp Senator, recently defeated for reelection, and now rewarded with an appointive job for which he has no known qualifications beyond a publicly expressed sympathy for aviation.

This industry is not in need of any sympathy. The present dollar value of aeronautical manufacture in the United States is well beyond that of the automobile industry at its greatest. It does, however, need competency in that part of the Government which has been sadly lacking.

This magazine has never been too happy about the membership of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Safety Board as they were originally constituted nor as they were revamped in the President's reorganization of 1940 into the present Civil Aeronautics Board. We have felt that there was in the Board's attitude and viewpoint too much of the amateur's ineptness and corresponding lack of objective and planning. There was, however, even though some decisions seemed more for political expediency than for sound business, no actual taint of politics.

We have heard the last few years a great deal about democracy. We are afraid that in all this talk we are losing sight of an equally important point — representation. Representative government is part and parcel of the American way and, if we are to have commission government, let's have it representative, representative of the industry concerned and of the interested public.

The Civil Aeronautics Board differs from other regulatory commissions in two important ways. Section 2 of the act definitely charges the Authority (now Board) with the responsibility of fostering the industry, which is quite different in concept to that of the thinking back of other regulatory acts whose prime consideration was to harness or break the power of an industry or activity that had become too powerful for the country's welfare.

The other difference is the broad scope of the Authority. A short-line railway can operate without coming under the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all phases of Aeronautics must meet the Authority or the Board save only construction for the military. Even military operations must conform in many respects to dictates of the Administrator. These things make it most important for the Board to be truly representative.

Who should be represented? Certainly the interested public, and on such Board it might be argued that ex-Senator Josh Lee, the successful job seeker, and ex-Representative Andrew Edmiston, the other seeker after the appointment, were qualified. However, as the constituents of these gentlemen soundly repudiated them, they can't be said to be representative of those constituents, at least. In any case it's the interested public that is supposed to be represented and such representation has been more evident in previous appointments than professional representation has been.

It is our opinion that public servants of the caliber of Harllee Branch adequately and most effectively represent the public. In addition, the board must include sound, broad-minded men with experience, chosen from the several parts of the industry—the air carriers, manufacturers, private flyers, and the educational field, including the so-called small operators. Furthermore, to be truly representative in selecting the membership, notice should be taken of the opinion within these groups. All of them include men of adequate caliber, sufficiently public spirited to take the chore and not expect it to become a sinecure. Their associates know just who these people are.

There is another strong reason for a board having long experience within the industry. History shows that the best transportation can best lead the world. We have in air transportation the potential key for that world leadership right here in the United States. What we do with it after this war is over depends upon the type and quality of leadership the industry gets. A board that has the confidence of the industry, together with adequate vision and the imagination, can supply a good part of that leadership.

Let us hope that the new Senate will refuse to endorse the appointment.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. MOORE. I yield for a question only.

Mr. OVERTON. Am I to understand that the opposition of the Senator from Oklahoma to the nomination is based on the ground that the nominee has not had sufficient practical experience in aeronautics to fit him for the duties required of a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, the answer to that question will be revealed by the presentation of my opposition.

Mr. OVERTON. Is that the position of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MOORE. I shall discuss that question during the presentation of my remarks.

Mr. OVERTON. Judging from the article which has just been read, I assume that to be the ground of the opposition of the Senator from Oklahoma to the nomination. If that be true, I should like to propound a question to the Senator which I hope will not be embarrassing. If the Senator intends to apply that yardstick in considering the nomination of former Senator Lee to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, may I ask the Senator what legislative experience he has had which justified him in seeking a seat in the Senate?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, I shall reach that question in due time.

Mr. President, I think this character of appointment is most important. I do not think the appointment should be confirmed. I might say that I have little expectation that it will not be confirmed. It has been intimated to me by Senators that I should not have made objection. One distinguished Senator has predicted that the appointment will be confirmed by the votes of at least 90 percent of the Members of the Senate. I have also been told, in substance, that these appointments are not based upon qualifications. I regret that practice, and I hope the people of the country regret it and may continue to do something about it.

What criticism has come to me because of my opposition to this appointment comes, of course, from ardent new dealers and from those who actually consider the New Deal inevitable and invincible. I do not share that belief. No party ever existed in American politics that did the injury to our Government that the New Deal has done, and many believe that the injury is almost irreparable. I know the injury has been great, and yet I think it can and will be repaired.

The New Deal party is the party that substituted government by bureaus for government under the Constitution. It has all but destroyed the two-party system of government. It is made up of former Democrats and former Republicans. If the two-party system of government continues to exist, the parties must be constituted from those who subscribe to the New Deal philosophy and those who oppose it.

The clear line of demarcation must be between those who submit to bureaucratic form of government and those who insist upon government under the Constitution. The cleavage must be between those who believe in government of men and those who believe in government of laws. I take my position with those who believe in a government of laws, and against those who believe in a government of men.

I do not admit the indispensability of any man. The New Deal party is the party that maneuvered the third term in memorable convention in Chicago in 1940. I remember very well that Josh Lee was an active participant in that farce. The people of Oklahoma remembered it, too. That New Deal convention reached an all-time low in political chicanery and skulduggery. I hope this country will never witness another such. I expect it to be tried, but I hope it will not prevail.

The New Deal party is the party that, through its inefficient bungling, has produced confusion almost to the point of discouragement of the economic activities among the people in their efforts at production so needed in the all-out war effort.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOORE. I do not yield.

Millions of people throughout the country were disappointed and disillusioned at the appointment of ex-Senator Brown to the important position of Price Administrator. That appointment, they fear, is of such a character as to be antagonistic to the needed harmonious administration of a vital war measure.

Former Senator Brown, like former Senator Lee, was a top-flight new dealer. Former Senator Brown was an outstanding advocate and partisan of legislation in the Seventy-seventh Congress generally known as the anti-inflation measure. That legislation was prepared by the bureau heads of this administration, and it stirred opposition that was bitter, both in the Congress and among the farmers of the country. The opposition to Senator Brown on account of that law, and the arguments that he employed in its behalf, no doubt made a large contribution to his defeat at the polls in Michigan.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MOORE. I yield only for a question.

Mr. LUCAS. Are we to vote on the nomination of former Senator Brown, as well as that of former Senator Lee?

Mr. MOORE. Former Senator Lee's appointment was made as a reward for his services to this New Deal administration.

Former Senator Lee's appointment is made for his services as a messenger boy for the executive department.

Former Senator Brown's appointment has been confirmed, and the people know that it was confirmed as a matter of political expediency. Senators may regret that they did not voice their opposition, as in their hearts they felt an opposition; and if they confirm the nomination we are now discussing, Senators may also regret that.

The President of the United States told the Congress that if the anti-inflation legislation were not passed he would issue an executive decree proclaiming it to be the law of the land and let another branch of the Government pass upon its validity. The Congress must have thought that other branch of the Government would hold the edict valid. That threatened edict stands out in brazen effrontery above anything I know of that has happened in this country.

Former Senator Brown made a powerful argument that Congress must acquiesce in the measure in order to avoid a head-on collision with the President.

Then he made his own interpretation of the law, one which was at variance with the intent of Congress. That interpretation was adopted by the Price Administrator by virtue of an Executive Order of the President.

The pending appointment may fail to inspire confidence on the home front; and such confidence, which is needed in the Government by the people, is so woefully lacking as to make an all-out war effort uncertain.

The appointment of former Senator Lee is so political and partisan that it probably will further the belief of the people that Congress has lost its independence and is constantly becoming so subservient to the will of the President that representative government will fade from the country. The last election should indicate a mandate from the voters that Congress should reassert its constitutional powers, and cease to take into the Government men appointed purely for political reasons, especially men who have been repudiated by the voters at any recent election.

The paramount thing to do is to win this war, not to be concerned about jobs for Senators who have been repudiated by voters at the polls.

There will be more appointments of this kind from time to time. The practice and tradition of senatorial courtesy may have its points, but it is no substitute for fitness for public service in important positions. There are available qualified men who would willingly serve at this critical time—men who are actuated by duty and patriotism, men who want to preserve this country for free enterprise and opportunity, not men actuated merely by political ambition.

The President, in connection with a meeting of the Democratic Party in Chicago, which accepted the resignation of Mr. Flynn as chairman of the committee, said:

> Americans of all parties are, of course, subordinating all considerations of partisan politics to the single task of these days—defeating the enemy and establishing a better future for ourselves and later generations.
> Where the safety and welfare of our country are concerned, there will be no division on political lines. But even in times of war, democracy as we know it, continues to rely upon sound, honest, strong, political parties—all bound together in a unified purpose to achieve overwhelming victory.

How magnanimous that statement is, and how willingly we would endorse it if it were true. Politics has had entirely too much to do with the prosecution of this war. Political expediency has had entirely too much to do with controlling the action of Congress. Under the cloak of war, Congress has adopted the blank-check practice that has enabled the building up of unneeded bureaus and bureaucrats throughout the length and breadth of the land. It has produced the infiltration of bureaucrats into every human activity. It has retarded industry; it has discouraged it, and it seeks to discourage it. The continuation of this bureaucratic form of government will totally destroy private enterprise. It may be designed to destroy private enterprise, and to institute in its stead governmental tyranny.

The New Deal party is the party which has arrayed class against class. It is the party of labor racketeers and big-city political machines. It is the party that seeks to perpetuate itself in power by whatsoever means it is necessary to employ. It is the party that not only violates the tradition of no third term, but it will stop at no term. It is now engaged in playing fourth-term politics; and it is the party that cries to high heaven against those who dare to challenge its partisan activities, and charges with treason those who dare to oppose it. The new dealers who were defeated in the last election went about the country charging that those who were opposed to the Roosevelt party were playing into the hands of Hitler.

Apparently the voters did not believe that those who dared to oppose the trend to socialism were traitors. Now it is the same men who made those spurious arguments, arguments that were disbelieved by the voters, who come back in great swarms for appointment to important places after they have been repudiated at the polls. They have gone out the front door, and yet come in through the back door by Executive appointment.

In Chicago, a few days ago, at the meeting of the Democratic National Committee, were heard warnings from the "nonpartisan" representatives of this administration; and in particular, Eugene Casey, who is one of the assistant secretaries to the President, referred to those directing the Senate investigation of Mr. Flynn as "embryo Presidential candidates in both parties", and said that "the fight being made on Flynn by the opposition and the anti-Roosevelt press is not so much against him personally as against your party and the President." He urged the committee to "be alert" and arouse the people against this "insidious and bypass method aimed at destroying the President" and said that his anger knew no bounds as he witnessed Democrats, who "owe their postions to the Democratic Party and the President," combining to block the progress of this administration. He referred to the case of Judge Meaney, who was elevated to the bench in New Jersey, and declared that attacks on him were engineered by "scheming Republicans" and "the hostile press." Resolutions were passed, "whereases" were indulged in, and "whereases" and resolutions were submitted—by whom? E. D. Rivers, a recent Governor of the State of Georgia. Is not his reputation for political trickery pretty well known to the country, and should his preachments be taken very seriously? He submitted, among other things, that the American people should be advised of the duplicity of a group that hopes to "repeat with Franklin D. Roosevelt what they did by similar methods to another great President, Woodrow Wilson." That is the same attitude that ran through all the demagogic speeches made in the last political campaign. This man Rivers further said that this attack upon Flynn is a treasonable plot to hamper the Commander in Chief by seeking to destroy the people's confidence in the President.

It is characteristic of the New Deal to charge treason against anyone who dares to oppose it. It is nothing new. It has been practiced year in and year out. It has been resorted to by every New Deal demagogue in his campaign speeches for reelection.

It is heartening to know today that the people have turned against the New Deal party as being inimical to the best interests of the American Government. They have turned against it because it is destructive of constitutional government. They are turning against it because it is leading to state socialism.

Mr. President, everybody in America today will support the Commander in Chief in his earnest efforts to prosecute this war to a complete and unconditional surrender; everybody will make any sacrifice that needs to be made to win this war, but many of us resent the using of the war as a smoke screen behind which these new dealers hide their schemes for socializing the country.

This appointment is political and partisan and it is based on nothing else. Lack of qualifications for the position is wholly ignored. It is universally conceded that this appointment was not made because of special fitness but because Josh Lee is a "lame duck" favorite of the White House and must be taken care of, war or no war. I have not seen a single newspaper, or heard of one in the State of Oklahoma, that is supporting Josh Lee for this appointment. The Oklahoma City Times suggests that Senator Lee write a letter to the President saying:

> Thanks, Mr. President, but I don't know a blooming thing about aviation and its problems. You had better give the job to someone who has had a little experience in the commercial or technical end of flying. My line is teaching and ranching. I thought I was a pretty good Senator, but the people of my home State fired me from that job rather decisively, and I'm going to stay home and try to beat back into the people's good graces, sticking to the jobs I am trained and fitted for.

Mr. President, it may appear to the Senate that I am taking this matter too seriously. If detached from the whole plan, it might seem that it was not of very great concern, but considered in connection with the whole plan that has been put into effect by this administration, it is working out to further regiment the people in their every activity. Today, in Oklahoma, there is being built up a huge political oligarchy. That probably applies to every portion of the country. Senator Lee is one of those who have been defeated at the polls on fundamental issues.

Any time a representative of the New Deal administration is appointed to some executive position, it enables him to build up, from his own kind, additional smaller-ilk bureaucrats. I am satisfied that today in Oklahoma there is a great deal of scurrying around by men and women who are looking for sinecures and jobs with the Federal Government. They are of the same stripe that were repudiated at the recent election. They have not surrendered. They will strike again in force. They are interested in jobs and patronage. They are not so much interested in winning this war, or in the preservation of this Government, as they are in having some easy job for themselves.

At a later time I shall prepare a list of "lame duck" appointees during this administration. I shall attempt to characterize, to some extent, what appears to be their concept of public service, and I shall give it circulation in the hope that it will be a helpful revelation to the public.

Why should we be reticent about opposition to appointments that we know to be purely partisan and political, and designed to further strengthen the power of the New Deal philosophy? It is said that in this administration an activity exists for the very purpose of finding places for obedient statesmen who have been defeated at the polls. Jobs have been created in advance in order that they may be filled by casualties in elections. A vacancy in a Federal judgeship exists in Oklahoma and has existed for more than 2 years, and yet no appointment has been made to this day. These jobs are created to be dangled before the eyes of ambitious political leaders in order that their support may be had in elections. I witnessed that in Oklahoma.

The full storm against practices of our Government has not as yet broken, but we can see the gathering clouds that, I hope, bode a storm of no small proportions.

Mr. President, probably no purpose would be served by my attempting to persuade the Senators that Josh Lee has no qualifications for the position to which he has been appointed. I have submitted a statement to each Member of the Senate, and I have submitted also an article from a reputable aviation magazine on the subject of the Lee appointment. If Senators have not read them, or are not interested in them, it is not my fault; I cannot help it. If they are not persuaded by them, that is their business.

There has been introduced in the House a bill prohibiting, for 2 years after he retires from Congress, the appointment of a Member of Congress to a position that was created during his term in Congress. I would favor that legislation, and I would probably make it a longer period than 2 years.

Men are defeated in elections usually because the people disagree with their concept of public service. A great Democratic President once said that a public office is a public trust. Many of us think that to be a sound concept.

In this appointment the safety of the public is concerned, and, for the public, that is more important than the safety of Senator Lee in a cushioned seat at the expense of the public and at the expense of the safety of the public.

I will regret to see this appointment confirmed, but if it is confirmed, it will probably be based upon so-called senatorial courtesy. If it is approved, and more like it, I shall hope that as a result of a continuance of the defiance of the judgment of the voters, new faces will appear here from time to time. Senatorial courtesy seems to impel Senators to confirm such partisan and political appointments. This nominee is no longer a Senator. He has been repudiated by the voters of his State. I happen to have been elected by the voters of the State, on a fundamental issue, to succeed him. So far, I have heard of very little senatorial courtesy being extended to me in my opposition to him. I am opposed to him for the reasons heretofore stated. I am a Member of the Senate, sent here by the voters of the sovereign State of Oklahoma.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, if I understand correctly, the Senate, in confirming an appointment sent by the Executive, not only confirms but, by its act of confirmation, assumes a share in the responsibility of the appointment.

To share that responsibility, it is right and proper and it is necessary that we know something of the qualifications of the appointee for the particular position. In the appointment under consideration, I have yet to hear that the appointee has any qualifications which would justify this body in assuming a share in the responsibility which would be theirs following confirmation.

Is there a yardstick to guide us in our confirmation of this and any other appointment of like character? Very definitely there is. First, and most important, does this appointment contribute to the war effort, and, secondly, has the appointee the necessary qualifications which would enable him to function efficiently as a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board?

Last week there was distributed the Annual Report of the Civil Aeronautics Board for 1942. As a new member of the Commerce Committee, I have read the report most carefully; in fact, I am giving it considerable study and have found that the most important functions of the Civil Aeronautics Board at this time are the coordination of the civil transport aircraft service with military activities; of war contracts entered into by the Army and Navy with the civil carriers; and study of wartime safety measures. A study of these matters shows that the civil air carriers are doing a great wartime job, and that, as the go-between, the arranging authority coordinating this effort with the military and naval war effort, the Civil Aeronautics Board functions, and the men comprising that Board should be men who have had experience in this particular phase of business or who have at least occupied some responsible executive position. I cannot find that this appointee has any such qualifications.

In the recent election nine Senators of the party in power were defeated, and nine new Senators of the opposition were elected to take their places. The new Senators come from such States as New Jersey, Delaware, West Virginia, Oklahoma, Michigan, Iowa, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Wyoming.

The opinions expressed at the polls by the voters in these States form a good cross-section of the opinions of the people of the entire Nation. The Senate is considering the confirmation of the appointment of one of the defeated Senators to an important Federal position. The repudiation of the defeated Senators in nine States is very definitely a repudiation by the entire country. These candidates defeated for reelection to the United States Senate should not now be placed in high executive positions in our Government.

A principle is involved, and I believe my actions should be directed toward the state of mind of the people of my State, and of the people of the United States. I do not feel, and I do not think the people of the country feel that, because certain ex-Senators may have rendered valuable service to a political party, their appointments should be ratified. When the people of their own States decided to terminate their careers as United States Senators, it is surely logical to conclude that they considered they were not qualified to represent them in highly lucrative Government positions.

I have no personal feelings regarding the ex-Senators. I do not know them. They are probably fine gentlemen, but appointments under the Government, which affect the lives of millions of people, should not, and must not, be determined by pleasant personal relationship.

The new Members of the Senate have a sense of duty to the people of the country. We have been sent here for a definite purpose. If we are to maintain our republican form of government, if we are to get away from the present bureaucratic form of government, we must heed the voice of the people, and we must oppose the ratification of the appointment of ex-Senators, who, during their term in the United States Senate, contributed to the building up of a form of government which the people of this country have definitely decided to eliminate.

A firm stand in these matters by the new Senators will give the country a badly needed renewal of confidence in the United States Senate.

These appointments have been referred to as "lame duck" appointments. Mr. President, this duck is not lame; he is dead. It is a case of a politically dead duck being resurrected to become a cornerstone of a crumbling bureaucracy, and I object, and I am taking this opportunity to express my objection in the constitutional manner, so that it may be a matter of record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURDOCK in the chair). The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Josh Lee, of Oklahoma, to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, Department of Commerce, for the remainder of the term expiring December 31, 1943?

Mr. OVERTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Aiken | George | Nye |
| Andrews | Gerry | O'Mahoney |
| Austin | Gillette | Overton |
| Ball | Green | Radcliffe |
| Bankhead | Guffey | Revercomb |

| Ellender | Moore | Willis |
| Ferguson | Murdock | Wilson |

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

On the question of the nomination of Josh Lee, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. WALLGREN] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senators from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY and Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is detained in the West on official business for the Senate.

I am advised that if present and voting the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. WALLGREN] would vote "yea."

I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LAFOLLETTE] is detained because of a slight cold. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. WALLGREN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is unavoidably absent.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is unavoidably detained. If present he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 31, as follows:

So the nomination of Josh Lee to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board was confirmed.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement as to why I voted "nay" on the question of the confirmation of former Senator Josh Lee, of Oklahoma, to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board. Such a vote is not a pleasant one to cast. My relations with former Senator Lee have always been friendly and pleasant in every way. In my humble estimation, however, this particular office calls for very far-reaching experience, understanding, and judgment. We have had a good many airplane accidents in the country. I do not say that any of them are attributable to the Board, but certainly the lessening of such accidents in the future will require of those who administer the Civil Aeronautics Authority the highest quality of good judgment and understanding of the particular operations undertaken in the aviation field. For another position which, in my judgment, would not require highly technical skill and knowledge, I should have been glad to support Senator Lee. I do not believe he is eminently qualified for the particular post, and I therefore voted "nay."

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 4, 1943, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Dear Father, we pray in the name of Him who carried eternity in His heart. We thank Thee that Thou art sufficient for every problem and disillusionment of life. Thine arm is not shortened and Thou art the shelter for every storm and the light which no darkness can dim. Thy ministries are very precious and our souls hang upon Thy fellowship; thus our love and life are strengthened and multiplied.

Reminded, dear Lord, of our inefficiency and dependence, we would indulge in no personal exaltation but humbly pray Thee to clothe us with a conscience that leaps beyond creed and liturgy, seeking the Christ alone whose infinite nature is interpreted in the borrowed center of the heavens: "I am the light of the world." In every county and State throughout our Union, may every man scorn disloyalty, sham, and fraud, inspired from a throne on which reigns the royalty of an unsullied conscience. Our Father, the day is weary, burdened with perplexity and unrest and need is crying from the four corners of this scarred and beaten globe. Oh, we pray for counsel that is wise, true, and just; direct all men with a searching eye to look within and in sacred calmness and quiet hear the small voice of the monitor within their own breasts. Oh, help us to be true to ourselves. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 28, 1943, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 5. Concurrent resolution expressing to the National Assembly and people of the Republic of Panama appreciation of their friendship for the United States.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. BREWSTER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government" for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agencies:

1. Department of Agriculture.
2. Department of the Navy.
3. Post Office Department.
4. Department of the Treasury.
5. Civil Service Commission.
6. Executive Office of the President (Office for Emergency Management).
7. The National Archives.

THE SIXTY-FIRST BIRTHDAY OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, Saturday last, while the House was not in session, was the sixty-first birthday of our beloved and courageous Commander in Chief, President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

It is fitting that we should pause today to congratulate and extend to our President our best wishes and felicitations on his birthday anniversary of a few days ago.

As the Washington Post well said in an editorial of last Saturday—

No man has had so much responsibility to the people in this Nation's history. No man has had as much responsibility to humanity. Indeed, we are all in the same boat, sailing to a new destiny, and he is our chief helmsman.

President Roosevelt is a precedent breaker. The first President to break the heretofore fixed third-term policy. If it was for no other reason than this, he would occupy a foremost page in American history.

President Roosevelt is the first President while in office to fly in an airplane.

He is the first wartime President to leave the continental United States in time of war.

Like the vision, courage, and adventurous spirit of Christopher Columbus brought about the discovery of a new world, out of which came our beloved country, so will the vision, the courage, and the sound, forward looking adventurous spirit of Franklin D. Roosevelt lead the way to victory, and thereafter toward a permanent peace and a better world in which men of good will can live.

President Roosevelt has always been found fighting for the preservation of our institutions of government; for sound, practical, social justice, for the progress of our people. To me, he is the real conservative, who tries to preserve our fundamentals and ideals by regulating and controlling abuses that exist, the continuance of which existence would or might prove harmful to our Nation.

We find him in 1933, when banking and business was prostrated, when fear was in the minds of all, particularly in the minds of our bankers and businessmen, stepping into the breach and saving our banking system, the economic lifeblood of our Nation. By his courageous leadership, in addition to saving our banking system, and the deposits of well over 20,000,000 of our people, he also saved business, industry, finance from complete prostration. Simply because some have forgotten does not minimize that fact.

He then thought of the weak, of the millions of unemployed and their families and dependents, of the farmers and their families, of the youth of the land, who were facing disillusionment.

Then came the march of totalitarianism, nazi-ism, fascism, and the Jap war-crazed imperialism and hatred of America, and he led in seeing the danger that confronted us—criticized, scorned, scoffed at by some, facing division from within, he carried on with faith, vision, courage, preparing our country for the impending danger. Everyone knows of the history of the past several years, and of the unusual foresight and courageous leadership of our Commander in Chief.

He has been characterized in many ways, the great humanitarian, the great leader, the man of courage, the man without fear, the precedent breaker, the hope of the oppressed and the conquered. I do not mention what he has been termed by his enemies, as they are not worthy of being dignified by notice.

You will note I say enemies, not honest critics, or persons who honestly misunderstood and who acted as their consciences dictated, and who found out later they were wrong in their outlook of the future, and that President Roosevelt was right.

But there is one title, in my opinion, future historians will give him—and with victory he will deserve—and that is "The Preserver of Democracy."

Washington: "The Father of Our Country."

Lincoln: "The Savior of Our Country."

Roosevelt: "The Preserver of Democracy."

It is interesting to note that Washington was first inaugurated in 1789. Lincoln, in 1861, was first inaugurated 72 years after Washington. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in 1933, was first inaugurated 72 years after Lincoln.

We of the House appreciate his responsibilities in this critical period of our Nation's history. Without regard to party, we of the House, as the Washington Post well said, recognize "he is our chief helmsman."

While all of our Members could not see eye to eye with the President on all occasions, practically all of our Members respect him personally; respect him as our President and, in this crisis, as our wartime Commander in Chief.

A few days ago we honored the memory of another great wartime President and Commander in Chief who has gone to meet His Maker, William McKinley, who, while on the stage of life, played an important part in the history and progress of our country.

Today we pause to extend our congratulations and to express our sentiments of respect, confidence, and support, not as Democrats or Republicans, or Independents, or otherwise, but as Americans, to our living wartime President and Commander in Chief, to this man of destiny, and to express the hope—yes, prayers—that God will continue to give him good health, and direct and guide him in the performance of his grave duties, in the early winning of the war, and in the establishment of a just, lasting, and permanent peace.

FORMER REPRESENTATIVE JOHN F. DOCKWEILER

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, many Members of this House who served with former Congressman John F. Dockweiler, of California, will be grieved to learn of his death, which occurred at his home in Los Angeles yesterday morning, January 31.

Mr. Dockweiler was born on September 19, 1895, in Los Angeles. He was a son of Isadore Bernard and Gertrude Dockweiler. His family has been prominent in the history of California since the early days. For more than 40 years his father has been an outstanding character in our State. Still living, he is regarded as the Old Roman of them all in the Democratic Party of California. He is the outstanding, living example of the type of men who led our progress from the earliest beginnings. Always abreast of the times, for many decades he has taken an active part in practically all questions associated with the progress and advancement of our State.

John was a worthy son of his father. His career was closely associated with many fraternal, civic, political, and economic activities of our State. His versatile work was reflected in his career in this House.

John Dockweiler was a graduate of Loyola College in Los Angeles in 1918 with a degree of bachelor of arts. In 1921 he graduated from the Southern California law school and subsequently took postgraduate work and special courses at Harvard Law School.

He was elected to Congress in 1932 and served here for 6 years in the Seventy-third, Seventy-fourth, and Seventy-fifth Congresses. He voluntarily retired in 1938 when he became a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor. Among a number of candidates, he received next to the highest vote.

While a Member of the House, Mr. Dockweiler served as assistant whip of his party. He was a member of the Appropriations Committee at the time of his voluntary retirement.

In 1940 he was elected district attorney of Los Angeles County. That county contains one of the greatest constituencies served by any county district attorney in the United States. He filled the office with diligence and great credit to himself and to our State.

While a Member of this body he won the respect and affection of its membership. He was a lovable character and an honor to California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I do this in order to add a few words to what the gentleman from Californi [Mr. LEA] has had to say about the sad passing of a former colleague in the House, Hon. John F. Dockweiler. I have been acquainted with our late colleague and members of his family, notably, his splendid father, for many years. The Dockweiler family has been one of the outstanding families in California from almost the beginning of its growth. Their service in various phases of public life has been one of the things that California is proud of. Brothers of our late colleague have served on the bench and in other capacities and always with outstanding record. Our late colleague is going to be missed by many people. He has given an administration as district attorney of our county which has won the approbation and approval of all constructive citizens, and I join with the dean of our delegation the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] in professing my own profound sorrow over his death.

Mr. ROGERS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of California. Mr. Speaker, Los Angeles has sad news today for many men in this House. John Dockweiler, who worked among you for 6 years, is dead. For those 6 years John represented the district which I now represent.

In California we have many legends—woven from the mission days, the Spanish land grants, the sudden impact of a bright, new civilization. The name Dockweiler is a signpost of this legend.

Isadore Dockweiler, John's father, rode horseback over southern California when the present site of Los Angeles was rolling hills, covered with cattle, herded by Mexican paisanos.

Isadore Dockweiler, pioneer, had 13 children. When they became grown, a new city, a white-walled, red-roofed city of 2,000,000 people, lay at their feet. And they were the literal symbol of this city's growth. They were Dockweiler doctors, Dockweiler lawyers, Dockweiler engineers, Dockweiler statesmen.

John, the statesman, is dead today, but in his father, Isadore the pioneer, lives on. And to him today I send my sorrow at the loss of his and California's son.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of personal loss that I have learned of the passing of one of the former Members of the California delegation in Congress. John F. Dockweiler served in this body for three successive terms, from 1933 to 1939, as a Member of the Seventy-third, Seventy-fourth, and Seventy-fifth Congresses. During his first term he was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and subsequently served on the Appropriations Committee on the subcommittee handling the appropriations for the War Department.

During his service here, John Dockweiler proved untiring in his efforts to promote and develop a sound program of national defense for the Nation, realizing as he did the great conflict of American and Japanese interests in the Pacific. With almost prophetic vision he daily championed the cause of greatly augmented coastal defenses for the entire Pacific coast, and it was due to his efforts almost exclusively that the harbor defenses of San Francisco Bay were greatly improved and strengthened. Who shall say that it was not due to these very installations that the perfidious attack of the Japanese on that eventful December 7 was not extended to include the bay region in the onslaught against the United States? Without hesitation John Dockweiler, as Congressman, urged upon both the War and Navy Departments a greater vigilance of the activities of the Japanese throughout his native State of California, but more particularly in and around the harbor and industrial areas of Los Angeles. With a keen discerning mind he anticipated the real treachery with which the Japanese would initiate an attack upon this Nation.

With a splendid legal education and the experience of several years of active practice, John Dockweiler was elected district attorney of Los Angeles County just 2 years ago, having previously been a candidate for the Democratic nomination as Governor of the State of California. He administered the duties of the office of district attorney efficiently and well, always having a high regard for the rights of individuals, the while he demanded the enforcement and prosecution of the law in the interests of good, sound government. It is indeed unfortunate for the people of Los Angeles County that the career of this able and industrious young attorney should be cut short in the very beginning of his service in government. That his absence will be keenly felt by all needs no comment on my part.

A kindly individual, John Dockweiler made a host of friends for himself while serving here in the Congress, and there are none who met him but admired him for his high principles and fine ideals. Quiet and unostentatious, he nevertheless displayed great vigor and force whenever the occasion demanded. He demonstrated in his daily life his fine character and deep religious convictions, splendid attributes, which merit for him the fond memory we shall always have of him. As he lays down the burdens of this life we pray that he may enjoy eternal rest and happiness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Mark Sullivan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a letter from the Military Order of the Liberty Bell, national headquarters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CAMP HALE, COLO.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the gentleman from Massachusetts, Congressman CLASON, read to me a letter from one of his constituents, wherein it was stated that he had heard that there had been deaths and much illness among the boys stationed at Camp Hale in Colorado. I had not heard any such rumor but since the camp is located in my congressional district, it seemed to me that an inquiry should be made at once.

Accordingly, I asked the Surgeon General's Office to make an investigation. I am glad to report that the Surgeon General has made a careful investigation and states that there has not been a single death among the soldiers since the camp was created; that the general health of the men is good; and that there were only minor ailments, such as measles, mumps, and common colds, usual to a group of enlisted men suddenly brought together from various parts of the United States. The only losses reported were two Army mules, and they were probably caused by a fall from some cliff.

Camp Hale is a comparatively new camp where men are taught skiing and mountain climbing and generally trained for mountain warfare. It is located at Pando, Colo., which lies at an elevation of 10,000 feet. Considering the high altitude and the vigorous exercise necessary to train mountain troops, I think that the health record of no deaths and only minor ailments among the thousands of troops stationed there, is remarkable.

I thought that you would be interested in this health report from a mountain training center high in the Rocky Mountains of Colorado.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, Tuesday, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and other special orders, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ERRONEOUS CHARGES AGAINST LEND-LEASE

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. At the last session of the House the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES], made certain charges against the administration of lend-lease. The day after this speech was delivered, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House heard Mr. Stettinius, the Administrator of Lend-Lease, and he completely answered and denied all of these charges made by the gentleman from Ohio. Since the membership of the House did not have the privilege of hearing the reply by Mr. Stettinius, and since readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD did not have that privilege, I wish to answer these four charges based upon Mr. Stettinius' reply thereto. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] stated that thousands of cases of beer, rayon hose, and power puffs have been shipped abroad and paid for with lend-lease funds.

The gentleman from Ohio is misinformed. No beer and no powder puffs have been bought with lend-lease funds. In procuring cotton hose for lend-lease shipment to north Africa, a small amount of cheap 25-cent-a-pair heavy-duty rayon hose was included along with the cotton hose. In addition, some rayon hose was included in various barter goods previously purchased by the War Department for our forces in north Africa to use in payment for local labor on airfields, barracks, and other installations.

Lend-lease shipments of clothing—and of food—for distribution to the civilian population of north Africa are a pressing matter of military policy. At General Eisenhower's urgent request, supplies are being sent to the people of North Africa who have been stripped to the point of destitution.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] also said that lend-lease is being forced on some countries that did not want it, and mentioned Bermuda specifically.

He has been misinformed. Acceptance of lend-lease aid has not been forced on Bermuda or on any country. As a matter of fact, no lend-lease aid has been given to Bermuda. Lend-lease aid is made available only at the specific request of the country to which such aid is to be rendered.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] also said that Harry Hopkins, as "lend-lease expediter," has absolute authority in assigning lend-lease shipments.

This charge is erroneous. E. R. Stettinius, Jr., has been Lend-Lease Administrator since October 28, 1941, when he was authorized by the President "to exercise any power or authority conferred upon the President" by the Lend-Lease Act, in accordance with the policies prescribed by the President.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] also said that the United States has no assurance that airplanes furnished our allies will not be used in the post-war period to take commercial airways away from this country.

Again the gentleman is in error. Under the terms of the master lend-lease agreements, the United States may require the return of any articles furnished under lend-lease, including all types of planes, that have not been "destroyed, lost, or consumed," and shall have been determined by the President to be "of use to the United States of America."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the subject of sponge iron, and to include a statement from Gov. J. Melville Broughton, of North Carolina, and also a brief statement from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, under the leadership of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOYKIN]; also a statement from Science News in Review?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WALTER WINCHELL

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I have always supposed that the rules and regulations of the Communications Commission prohibited the use of profanity and the utterance of sentiments calculated to stir up hatreds and disunity on the radio.

Last evening I listened to Walter Winchell. Apparently he feels that he is above the rules and regulations that apply to citizens generally, because in his broadcast last evening, in my judgment, he reached a new low as a purveyor of hate and discord when he contemptuously referred to the reelection of Members of Congress whose pre-Pearl Harbor voting record he had so vigorously condemned. He spoke as one who had been thwarted and rebuked by the people of the country who went to the polls and cast their votes last November. While impliedly admitting the failure of his campaign of hate directed at many Members of Congress, last night he directed his vituperation and venom toward the millions of American citizens who voted their honest convictions and returned to the Congress of the United States men and women in whom they had confidence. I was astounded to hear him indict the patriotism and intelligence of millions of American people when he stated in substance that what worried him most today was the "damn fools who voted for them."

It is true that he apologetically stated that there were hundreds of good and able representatives in the Congress, and he singled out our colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McGRANERY], as a wonderful man. I hope that this orchid tossed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McGRANERY] will not be the kiss of political death such as he administered to our erstwhile colleague, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK]. Winchell has taken on a big order this time when as an officer in the United States Navy he referred to millions of decent Americans as damn fools and desecrated a decent Sabbath evening and every law of radio to give vent to his undisguised venom. It seems to me, Mr. Winchell, that you owe an apology to the people of America.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a short editorial on the farm problem.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the Farm Journal on concentrated feeds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution of the Cleveland City Council.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct the RECORD and to address the House for 1 minute to make an explanation of the correction, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on January 28, I followed Judge SUMNERS in referring to the Civil Air Patrol. The RECORD on page 443 contains an error which changed the context very much. I said that the men of the Civil Air Patrol are not exempt from the draft and that therefore the Civil Air Patrol depends on men who are not subject to military service. In the RECORD the word "not" was omitted and it appears that those men "are exempt from the draft," which is a great injustice and an erroneous statement.

Among these men of the Civil Air Patrol are fat ones, bald-headed ones, old ones and underage ones, because they are subject to the draft and are not exempt because of that service. Thus we are getting splendid service in the air from men who would not otherwise be in the military service.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an address by Nicholas Picchione on the negative side of the Ruml plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a radio speech which I have made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an article by Thomas Lyons, Secretary of the Foreign Trade Zone Board. I have cleared through the Government Printing Office and the cost of this will be $90.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

MERCHANT MARINE SEAMEN AT GUADALCANAL

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, a statement recently appeared in some of the public prints, which statement was reechoed on the floor of this House, that seamen in the merchant marine have refused to unload supplies and discharge cargoes from ships at Guadalcanal. There is a welcome disclaimer of that statement. Admiral Halsey states that "in no instance have merchant marine seamen refused to discharge cargo from their vessels at Guadalcanal or in any other way failed to cooperate with United States forces ashore in that area."

That statement, originally made, was an aspersion upon the brave merchant marine men who daily risk their lives on the Atlantic and the Pacific, who risk being bombed and torpedoed by U-boats every hour. Those who made and repeated that lie and aspersion now have a glorious opportunity to apoligize to those brave men.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the regular business of the day and any other special orders today I may proceed for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TIRES ON JAPANESE-OWNED AUTOMOBILES AND TRUCKS

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, in these days when Rubber Czar Jeffers professes his inability to get the synthetic-rubber program under way and our supply from natural sources continues to dwindle, one cannot help but wonder whether or not there is any cooperation among the various agencies of the Government in an effort to relieve the situation.

From isolated press dispatches which have been called to my attention, verified by independent investigation, I am convinced that there are in excess of 25,000 Japanese-owned automobiles and trucks in storage in our Pacific coastal States, upon which there are some 125,000 serviceable tires which, if put into use, would contribute much to the solving of the problem with which we are now vexed.

Furthermore I am informed that Japanese-owned tractors, threshing machines, pumping equipment, motors, and other agricultural implements of a value running well into millions, are also impounded in storage and, therefore, out of use in our food and fiber production program at a time when agricultural implements and equipment are sorely needed upon our western farms.

If there were ever an occasion when different departments and agencies of Government could cooperate to the advantage of our war effort, this situation presents a striking example. Is it not time for the War Relocation Authority to get together with Mr. Jeffers' rubber agency and the Department of Agriculture with a view of recovering this rubber for use and these agricultural implements for service upon our farms?

It is not reasonable to ask the American people to continue their personal sacrifices in order to supply service deficiencies when our war-making officials constantly overlook opportunities such as the ones to which I have today called the attention of the Congress.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, after the business of the day and any other special orders, I may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLISON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my own remarks and to include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLISON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago charges were made, on the floor of the House, that merchant seamen refused to unload a cargo at Guadalcanal on a Sunday, in conformity with the rules of the maritime union, thus compelling convalescent marines to do the job. It was a serious charge.

It has now been proven that the charge was baseless, in that the incident never occurred.

It is both proper and fitting that a denial of this unfounded charge be made from the same forum from which the original charge was made because, as it happens, it was an unwarranted attack upon heroic seamen who are performing brave, noble, and essential service.

In this connection, I should like to read a brief editorial which appeared in the Baltimore Evening Sun of January 29, entitled "End of an Evil Rumor." It should be recognized that the Baltimore Sun papers are considered among the best in this part of the country:

END OF AN EVIL RUMOR

That story about the merchant seamen who refused to unload ships at Guadalcanal on Sunday because it was against their union rules, has been officially denied. Admiral Halsey, commander of the United States forces in the South Pacific states:

"None of the crews has ever refused to discharge its ship's cargo, and the merchant seamen's cooperation, efficiency, and courage—on some occasions in the face of enemy attack—have won high praise."

It is a salutary thing to have this report squelched by the highest naval authority in the area in which the incident was supposed to have occurred. For this story was exactly the kind that Herr Doktor Goebbels would be happy to have going the rounds. Far too many tales do go the rounds, and baseless though most of them are, they are repeated by irresponsible persons until they gain such wide currency that even sensible people begin to wonder if there might not be some truth in them. Whenever that point is reached, Herr Doktor Goebbels' aim—which is to spread distrust and dismay—has in some measure been achieved. The unfounded-rumors machine is working for him.

The Guadalcanal story was especially harmful in that it appeared to have some basis in fact and could be traced, as the others so seldom can be, to a respectable and apparently reliable source. It was especially hateful, in that it tended to discredit the men of the merchant navy—men who have been exposed time and again to attack by planes, subs, and surface warships, and whose work is at all times arduous and risky.

The merchant marine is performing its indispensable task with efficiency and courage, as Admiral Halsey has said. The story that some merchant crews refused to work in an emergency has been denied by him. That should be the end of such rumors.

I, and I am sure all of you, must agree with the sentiments expressed in this editorial.

THREAT TO LIVESTOCK DISEASE CONTROL

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, on January 27 my esteemed colleague the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN] sounded a timely warning on the dangers from the foreign livestock malady, foot-and-mouth disease. His remarks were clear, concise, and convincing, but they dealt only with what might be termed predictable avenues through which this disease, and other foreign diseases of comparable seriousness, may menace our livestock industry.

With a world at war we must not only envision the usual or predictable means by which our livestock may fall victim to this disease but in addition what may be termed the unpredictable means such as the willful and malicious activities of saboteurs.

Our enemy countries as well as other European and Asiatic countries are now suffering the most severe scourge of this disease in history. Obviously our best precautions may, during wartime, be circumvented. Therefore, our vigilance against its introduction is not enough. There must be no weakness in our preparedness plan to cope with the disease should it make its appearance within our borders.

There were 5 separate invasions of foot-and-mouth disease in the United States during the first 29 years of the present century. Each outbreak was of foreign origin and was vigorously combatted and promptly eradicated. The two most destructive outbreaks occurred in 1914–16, involving the livestock to a greater or less degree of 22 States, and in 1924–25, when 2 States—1 very seriously—were involved.

Throughout the five campaigns against this costly plague the responsibility for its control and eradication was vested in the Bureau of Animal Industry for the Federal Government, and the comparable veterinary organizations of the affected States. No State has ever shirked its responsibility during such times, but in most cases State veterinary forces have been limited, and it became necessary for the Federal Government to provide the major veterinary personnel.

Foot-and-mouth disease is an acute, rapidly spreading, infectious disease and its successful extermination calls for a large, well-trained, and mobile veterinary force. The United States Bureau of Animal Industry has kept constantly in readiness a program and personnel roster for immediate action whenever necessary.

The Bureau is the largest single employer of veterinarians in the world. In normal times they are employed in regular assignments, in various divisions o. the Bureau, but in case of emergency they are quickly mobilized for such essential special duty.

The Bureau has each time been successful in quickly placing into the field to combat foot-and-mouth disease a large force of veterinarians experienced in the diagnosis, control, and disposition of infected animals.

Mr. Speaker, we have spent large sums of money from private and public sources to eradicate and control animal disease in this country and now have the cleanest livestock in the world. We are literally holding in trust for the rest of the world the best blood lines now existent for the reestablishment of herds and flocks in other countries when the war is over.

With this in mind, I have been very seriously concerned over reports that the Bureau of Animal Industry is to be broken up under plans for a reorganization of the Department of Agriculture. Acting under authority of an Executive order issued on December 5, 1942, the Secretary of Agriculture is now entertaining a proposal to detach permanently the Meat Inspection Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry and place it in the Food Distribution Administration.

Such a move would reduce by about 900 the number of trained veterinarians now available to the Bureau to combat such diseases as foot-and-mouth disease.

My remarks should not be construed as minimizing the importance of the food distribution program, but I am greatly concerned when from any source or through any pretext, action is contemplated which tends to deplete the only organization that is competent to furnish the protection required by our livestock industry against the threat of such a devastating malady as foot-and-mouth disease.

Any benefit that might be furnished to the Food Distribution Administration by such a move would sink into insignificance when compared to the loss that would unavoidably be sustained should we suffer an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to place in the RECORD at this point a letter directed to the Secretary of Agriculture by the American Veterinary Medical Association, urging that the Bureau of Animal Industry be maintained as an intact working organization, with all its forces under the unified direction of a veterinarian as chief:

AMERICAN VETERINARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., January 21, 1943.

Hon. CLAUDE R. WICKARD,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The board of governors of the American Veterinary Medical Association are much concerned about the future of the Federal Meat Inspection Service and the disease control and prevention agencies which have been directed so long and so efficiently by a veterinarian as Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

The fact that the United States is today the safest place in the world in which to grow livestock is not the result of mere accident but of planned and practical methods, based on scientific knowledge such as:

1. The control of infectious diseases within the country itself.

2. The development and enforcement of regulations which have served, with rare exceptions, as effective barriers against the introduction of livestock disease plagues prevalent in other countries.

For over 50 years the Federal Bureau of Animal Industry has had the benefit of competent veterinary direction and has functioned faithfully and efficiently in protecting our livestock industry.

In cooperation with the entire veterinary profession, it has completely rooted out or brought under control several devastating livestock diseases and has eradicated foreign plagues on the few occasions that they have been introduced into this country.

The system of animal disease control developed in the United States has been the marvel of its kind and the envy of other countries.

It spells the difference between a prosperous agricultural nation and one burdened by enormous losses.

Moreover, the effective control of infectious and contagious diseases of animals under competent veterinary direction has been an important public-health factor through the suppression of those animal diseases which are transmissible to man.

On the basis of the record, there would seem to be no justification for a change in the administration or the make-up of the Federal Bureau of Animal Industry, both of which have enabled it to function as a well-rounded unit to meet all requirements and emergencies. Of all times in the Nation's history, it would seem particularly ill-advised now to make changes which might create confusion and impair the proven efficiency of an organization when it is most essential to the successful prosecution of the war program.

It is therefore our firm conviction that, for the best interests of the entire country, the Federal Bureau of Animal Industry should remain as an intact working organization and with all its forces under the unified direction of a veterinarian as Chief.

Sincerely yours,

O. V. BRUMLEY,
Dean, School of Veterinary Medicine, Ohio State University, and Chairman, Board of Governors, American Veterinary Medical Association.

W. W. DIMOCK,
Head, Department of Animal Pathology, University of Kentucky, and President, American Veterinary Medical Association.

C. W. BOWER,
Practitioner, Topeka, Kans., and President-elect, American Veterinary Medical Association.

J. C. HARDENBERGH,
Executive Secretary, American Veterinary Medical Association, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and to include therein a letter from the Veterinary Medical Association to Hon. Claude Wickard.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, following the other special orders, I may address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE PRESIDENT'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I commend the splendid remarks made by our distinguished majority leader in recognition of the birthday of our Commander in Chief on last Saturday.

We Georgians look upon President Roosevelt as a part-time citizen of our State. We recognize not only his splendid leadership as President throughout the years and his magnificent work as Commander in Chief of this great Nation and of the United Nations, but particularly do we appreciate the humanitarianism of this great man and the fine work he has done at Warm Springs, Ga., in the establishment of that institution for the treatment of sufferers of infantile paralysis.

Last Friday night it was my privilege to attend a dinner given for the stars who were here to celebrate his birthday. Among those stars was a splendid young woman, a singer, who herself has suffered from infantile paralysis, but who has had the courage to carry on and continue to use her beautiful voice notwithstanding her inability to walk.

I think the most amazing thing about our Commander in Chief is the courage he has displayed in the face of his handicap, and especially the courage he has shown in the last few weeks in making that dangerous trip to north Africa in the interest of carrying on our war against the enemy.

I know we all join in felicitating him on his sixty-first birthday and wish him continued happiness and good health.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article from the Washington Times-Herald.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief article by Frank Kent.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

"LAME DUCKS"

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, I take this minute to call attention to a bill which I have this day introduced in the House.

When the citizens of the Eleventh Ohio District inform me at the polls that my services are no longer desired as their Congressman, I trust that I will retire gracefully and not attempt to force my attention of my "lame duck" services on them, whether it be done by Executive order or as permitted in the present law which I am attempting to repeal.

I realize that there may be certain business which requires time to complete before retiring, but it seems to me that the time elapsing between the defeat of a candidate in early November and the time of seating the new Congress in early January is sufficient time for any "lame duck" to still keep his bill in.

Since coming here in January I have run into several examples where I am actually stymied in rendering proper service to my constituents because of the present law, which extends the "lame duck's" authority for full 6 months, or until June 30, following his retirement in January.

This is particularly manifest in regard to the Agricultural Yearbook. As I understand it, these books are placed to the credit of the individual Members of Congress in November, and even though the Member be defeated in November, these publications still remain to his credit and cannot be released to the newly elected Member unless the defeated candidate so orders. This very definitely works a hardship upon the newly elected Members, as well as upon his constituents back home who are desirous of obtaining these publications.

It seems to me that the authority of any defeated candidate should cease at the same time the newly elected Congressman's authority begins, and I trust that you will see your way clear to support my bill.

RESIGNATIONS FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignations from committee:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1943.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby submit my resignation as a Member of the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives.

Very sincerely yours,

WILSON D. GILLETTE.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1943.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Very sincerely yours,

JAMES WOLFENDEN.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignations will be accepted.

There was no objection.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 88), which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That WILSON D. GILLETTE, of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, elected to the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives.

PROGRAM FOR TUESDAY

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to inquire of the majority leader about the program for tomorrow, Tuesday. I understand there has been a change in the program.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. The Committee on Rules reported out a rule making in order a bill reported out of the Naval Affairs Committee. This will come up on tomorrow. I understand there is nothing controversial about it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How much general debate will there be on the resolution?

Mr. SABATH. One hour. There is no opposition to it from any source.

Mr. McCORMACK. And while I am on this subject, if I may encroach upon the minute's time given my friend from Massachusetts, I wish to make an announcement to the Democratic Members.

On Thursday after the legislative day is over there will be a caucus of the Democratic Members for the purpose of selecting a nominee for the position of Doorkeeper.

This is an announcement for my own side. Notices will not go out much before tomorrow or Wednesday morning, and so the Democratic Members may know as soon as possible I make this announcement. The second matter before the caucus will be the question of permitting Democratic Members on select committees to also serve on the District of Columbia Committee. In other words, the District of Columbia Committee will be an exception to the rule against Members of select committees serving on other committees.

Mr. BULWINKLE. May I ask the gentleman about his program for the week? I am filing a report on the telegraph merger bill and I hope to appear before the Rules Committee as early as possible. I know the chairman of that committee will grant a hearing as early as possible.

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot make any promises now. I cannot see how it can come up this week, but I will see that it is brought up as soon as possible.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an article by one of America's foremost authors, Stuart Edward White.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON]?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL SHIP REPAIR FACILITIES FOR THE UNITED STATES NAVY

Mr. DELANEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 87, Rept. No. 68), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 1446, a bill authorizing appropriations for the United States Navy for additional ship repair facilities, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief editorial that appeared in the Louisville Courier-Journal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION]?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

On January 31, 1943, there was disseminated a pamphlet by the National Lawyers Guild, and I read from it the following excerpt:

To the Members of the House of Representatives:

MARTIN DIES and his committee is the secret weapon with which Adolf Hitler hopes to soften up our Nation for military conquest.

I have many excerpts, not only from this but from other pamphlets, all of which raise clearly a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the gentleman is entitled to an hour. He asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, we are engaged in a great struggle to preserve our constitutional government and our American way of life. The most important phase of that struggle is the supreme effort to win the war. To that end all of us, of every political party, are devoting all of our energies, our resources, and our ability. The House of Representatives has from the beginning of this emergency cooperated in every respect with the executive department in order to prepare this Nation for the struggle. There is no Congress in the history of America that appropriated more money for our military preparedness than the last Congress. The executive department has received the fullest degree of cooperation in its effort to defeat the Axis Powers.

But while this is the most important phase of the present conflict, there is another phase of almost equal importance. This is not only a clash between the armies of the Allied Nations and the armies of the Axis Powers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman tell us who made that statement?

Mr. DIES. The National Lawyers Guild. I will get to that and other statements as I go along.

Mr. Speaker, of almost equal importance with the conflict between rival armies, the armed forces of democracy and the armed forces of the Axis Powers, is the struggle between conflicting ideologies of government. The nineteenth century liberalism which advocated the protection of individual rights, which culminated in those great and eternal beliefs and philosophies which surround the individual with every possible protection in the enjoyment of his rights, has been challenged for a long time by a new philosophy which in one country is communism, in another country fascism, in another country nazi-ism, and in another country bureaucracy. But the underlying principle of all of these philosophies is essentially the same. Stripped of their verbiage and viewed in the naked truth, we find similar phrases, and similar expressions, as well as similar policies and programs advocated in each instance.

We hear the voice of Adolf Hitler when he contended in Mein Kampf that the highest duty of the individual is to subordinate himself to the state. We read in the doctrines of Marx the pronouncement that the state must be supreme. In the fascism of Mussolini there is a corporate state administered and controlled by a self-perpetuating bureaucracy. The very essence of fascism is and has been a centralized state, a state that expands, extends, and broadens until ultimately the individual becomes a mere cog in a collectivistic system of government.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman has overlooked, in my opinion, one of the most important, one of the most dangerous ideologies that threatens America now and for generations to come. That is the ideology known as Shintoism that Japan is spreading throughout the world and especially in the United States.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman is absolutely correct. The point I am trying to make is simply that when liberalism first came into existence it represented a struggle of the people against centralized government and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] stated in a speech a few days ago, and he expressed it so appropriately, the history of democratic progress has been the history of decentralization. Liberalism was derived from the word liberty. It meant those who were in favor of the liberty of the individual and of the entire body of society. It meant those who were struggling against a great bureaucratic or autocratic or oligarchic government, whichever you may term it, in which the citizen became nothing and the state was everything.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The House is not in order. Some Members on that side are holding a conversation.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. DIES. We sometimes overlook the fact that in our own country there has been a trend toward centralized government, not of the same nature and perhaps not as marked as in foreign countries, but, nevertheless, over a period of several or more decades there has been a constant, steady trend toward bureaucratic and centralized government and away from the original concept of our fathers.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Just a moment ago a gentleman stood up and pointed his hand in a certain direction. Three or four gentlemen were standing here. I wonder whether the gentleman would care to identify the person to whom he was calling attention.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will do it if the gentleman wants me to.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I identify him by the group who finds this bad medicine.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, it is essential, of course, to this country that every Member of the House or of the other body strive in every possible way, by example, by speech, by conduct, to contribute to the successful prosecution of this war. All Members of this House are vitally and deeply interested in it. Most of us have boys who are now in the service of their country, many of us have nephews and friends and boys of our friends who are fighting on foreign soil. But it is equally important that we as a legislative branch of this Government guard jealously and zealously the rights and the prerogatives of this body.

The very heart and core of democracy is the parliamentary system. The history of every country that has lost its liberty is the history of the gradual centralization of power in the Executive and the stripping, so to speak, of the legislative branch of government of its powers and prerogatives.

When the time comes in this country that the legislative branch of government lacks that independence and that courage to speak honestly and truthfully and to vote convictions that are sincerely and profoundly felt, that moment will mark the decay and the disintegration of this Republic. Nations are sometimes destroyed by a sudden revolution, but more often republics are destroyed by the gradual process of subversion, the step-by-step method under which under one pretext or another one power is taken away from the legislative branch and then another power is taken away from it, until finally we have the totalitarian scheme of bureaucracy which means government by bureaucratic edict, which is the first step toward dictatorship, which creates conditions under which dictatorship is inevitable.

The Roman republic preserved the externalism and the forms of a democracy or of a republic long after Caesar had usurped the real functions of the legislative branch of government. He permitted the Roman senate to exist as window dressing during a period of transition, because he well knew that the people of Rome were not quite prepared for the destruction of their republican system.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, a wise and alert Congress working in the interest of a free electorate will always be jealous of its rights and will resist every attempt that may be made to curtail those rights and responsibilities.

There is no more insidious way of destroying democracy than the method of discrediting the Congress of the United States. I do not mean by that that people should not criticize Congressmen or the Congress. I recognize that Congress, like the executive branch and the judicial branch, should always welcome constructive criticism from the Nation. There is no one so perfect that he cannot improve himself with the aid of constructive criticism. Therefore I do not want to be understood as branding as subversive those who exercise their God-given right to criticize Members of Congress or to criticize Congress.

THE CAMPAIGN TO DISCREDIT CONGRESS

I am referring, Mr. Speaker, to what I conceive to be a well-organized and highly financed conspiracy on the part of devotees and followers of totalitarianism to discredit individual Members of Congress, to discredit committees of Congress, and to discredit Congress as a whole. It is a very clever piece of strategy, one with which I have been familiar for some time, a strategy that I knew 4 years ago would inevitably be used in this country when the occasion made it appropriate, the strategy of attempting to pin the Nazi or Fascist label upon all those who do not agree to certain principles or certain policies of the present administration.

But, Mr. Speaker, in their attempt to discredit Congress through this smearing campaign, it is only right that Congress should know who is engineering the campaign, who is financing the campaign, and why they are attempting to do it. I have here a number of excerpts from different magazines and publications. From the New Republic, for instance, as follows:

> MARTIN DIES, a Democrat of Orange, Tex., who came to Congress in 1931, had been so clearly acting in the best interest of the Axis Governments that he is now the most frequently quoted American on Axis broadcasts sent to this hemisphere.

That was used not only in the New Republic but in other magazines of the same character as a part of a well-organized conspiracy to create the impression, through the Hitler tactics of propaganda, that the committee that I have the honor to serve as chairman has been pro-Axis or pro-Hitler. This first appeared in the form of a release of a statement purporting to come from the Federal Communications Commission, to the effect that the listening post of the Commission had discovered that my name was more frequently used by the Axis Powers than any other living American. The truth was that our committee had just exposed some of the officials in that Commission, and in their attempt to fight back or to discredit the committee this so-called report was first given to the Birmingham Age-Herald, a newspaper published in Alabama, and then to Newsweek and PM. I immediately took the matter up with Mr. Fly, and, of course, there was not any such report, and, of course, there was no action taken by the Communications Commission to ascertain who was the most frequently quoted American. It came from those in the Commission who wanted to smear me and to create the impression that I had favored the Axis Powers. It would be unimportant that it should be mentioned to the House were I the only Member of Congress who has been repeatedly attacked by this group, but let us remember that, preceding the last campaign, there were attacks made on a majority of the Members of this House. The attacks were not confined to temperate language. There was no attempt to constructively criticize Congress. Wholesale and sweeping indictments were made that Members of this Congress were the tools and agents of Adolf Hitler.

Let us take, for instance, the New Republic. Here is a magazine, Mr. Speaker, that parades under the name of liberalism. It pretends to speak for the liberals of America. This magazine carried a number of statements accusing many Members of this House of being Fascists and sympathizers with the Axis Powers. I want to discuss, if I may, this magazine. I want to point out the part which the magazine, the New Republic, has played in this coalition of antiparliamentarism.

It will be recalled that the vicious document known as A Congress To Win the War was published as a supplement to the New Republic on May 18, 1942. The Union for Democratic Action and the New Republic claimed joint responsibility for the document.

Before I divulge to this House a startling fact about the New Republic, I wish to refresh your memories concerning a few of the magazine's editors. For many years Malcolm Cowley has been one of the editors of this journal. On January 15, 1942, I addressed this body at some length on the record of Malcolm Cowley. I also presented to every Member of the House 24 pages of documentary evidence which established conclusively that Malcolm Cowley had for years collaborated closely with the Communist Party; that he had, in fact, served publicly as a member of the Communist Party's campaign committees. A few days after I exposed Cowley's record, he published a volume of poems in one of which he described enthusiastically the march of a mob of armed revolutionists upon the Capitol and their successful armed seizure of the very Chamber in which we sit today. At the time I addressed the House on Cowley's record and at the very time he published his poems, he was employed in the Office of Facts and Figures as chief information analyst at $8,000 a year. As a result of my exposure, Cowley was forced back into private life, where he resumed his editorial duties on the New Republic.

For many years one of the New Republic's contributing editors has been Rexford Guy Tugwell, original "brain truster," whose current administration of the affairs of Puerto Rico reflects no credit upon himself or those who appointed him to the position of Governor of the island. The outstanding feature of Tugwell's administration has been a complete and undisguised contempt for the legislative branch of the Puerto Rican government. While holding his important post in our overseas island possesion, Tugwell has maintained his official connection with the New Republic, and his name appears on the masthead of the very issue in which the vicious assault upon Members of this House was made last May.

Bruce Bliven is the guiding genius and principal editor of the New Republic. The kind of pseudo-liberalism which Bruce Bliven represents is revealed in his link with one of the enterprises of Joseph P. Lash, that perennial youth leader of America. Bliven wrote the introduction for one of Lash's books, a copy of which I hold in my hand. The book bears the imprint of the Communist Party's publishing establishment, which is known as International Publishers, but the chief fact with which I am now concerned is Bruce Bliven's glowing recommendation of Lash's views as set forth in this volume.

Naturally, I cannot quote at any great length from Lash's book, but I must point out that its entire substance is propaganda for the idea that American youth should, in the book's own words, "refuse to support any war which the United States Government may undertake." Appearing exactly 60 months before Pearl Harbor, the book contains Lash's own announcement that he was "waging a vigorous battle against American war preparations." Among other things, Lash demanded—and I quote his exact words—"drastic reduction in the present armaments budget, especially the Navy." Lash further proclaimed himself the leader of "mass resistance" against the United States Government in the event of this country's involvement in any war in Europe or the Pacific. I could go on quoting indefinitely the un-American sentiments of this self-styled leader of our American youth, but I must satisfy myself with the repeated observation that Bruce Bliven, principal editor of the New Republic, placed his unqualified endorsement upon this subversive propaganda which was written by Lash and published by the Communist Party.

Bruce Bliven has long proclaimed himself "a sincere liberal." That was his defense in the columns of his magazine last July shortly after our committee exposed the un-American and subversive attack upon Congress, made jointly by the New Republic and the Union for Democratic Action. I declare, and the record which I am revealing proves, that Bruce Bliven more fittingly represents the utter intellectual bankruptcy of pseudo-liberalism. What possible element of true liberalism can be found in a man who at one moment comes out for "waging a vigorous battle against American war preparations" and then does a complete right-about-face and attacks Congress for having made too meager preparations for war?

As a sample of the downright falsehoods which the New Republic distributed far and wide in its attack upon the Congress, I cite a single example together with Bruce Bliven's own acknowledgment of the falsity of his magazine's charges. One of the Members of this House in the Seventy-seventh Congress—let us call him Congressman X—was accused of certain things in the New Republic's supplement of May 18, 1942. He was accused of being interested in a company where the employees were paid 10 cents an hour. He was further said to have been found guilty of unfair labor practices by the National Labor Relations Board. It was further alleged by the New Republic that the efforts of the American Federation of Labor to organize Congressman X's plant were met with stubborn resistance by the management. All of these charges were absolutely without any foundation in fact, yet the New Republic which contained these falsehoods was distributed throughout the district of Congressman X. In the recent election Congressman X was defeated. Almost 7 weeks after election day Bruce Bliven wrote the following to Congressman X:

> I find that in some instances we did you an injustice, and we are planning to print a correction and expression of regret on these points in the New Republic in the immediate future.

Now let us suppose for the moment that Congressman X wanted to sue the New Republic for the irreparable damage which he suffered in consequence of the magazine's admitted falsehoods. Would he be able to do so? Absolutely not. One hundred percent of the New Republic's capital stock is owned by a foreign corporation. That is the startling fact which I promised to disclose about this pseudo-liberal publication.

On the masthead of the New Republic, the publisher's name is given as Editorial Publications, 40 East Forty-ninth Street, New York. An investigation into the ownership of Editorial Publications revealed that all of the capital stock of the organization is owned by a foreign corporation. Consider, therefore, the effrontery of Bruce Bliven and his magazine in issuing any kind of advice on the composition of the Congress of the United States, to say nothing of their attack upon the institution of Congress. The capital stock of Editorial Publications is listed with the secretary of state of New York as $1,750,000, but not 1 cent of that stock is held in the United States.

The case of the New Republic is reminiscent of the Bermuda corporations which the Treasury Department exposed not many years ago. I hardly need to point out that the Treasury Department kept hands off the New Republic even though its situation was exactly parallel to those Bermuda corporations which served the interests of various American concerns by avoiding corporation taxes in the United States, by concealing the source and location of funds, and by enabling those concerns to evade process within the jurisdiction of the United States. Sue the Republic? Not a Chinaman's chance, for its capital stock is safely lodged in a foreign corporation. And this, my colleagues, is the foreign corporation which lies back of the vicious attack upon the Congress which was distributed in an issue of a million copies last May. And this is the foreign corporation whose employee, Malcolm Cowley, enthusiastically rendered into poetry his imaginary seizure of this Chamber by an armed mob of insurrectionists. And this, furthermore, is the same foreign corporation whose magazine, in its current issue, sees in Winston Churchill only "a Tory Prime Minister" and sees in our American State Department only a vicious collaborator with Hitler's "nearest spiritual relatives."

"CITIZENS FOR VICTORY" ATTACKS CONGRESS

Next, I shall take up the purge organization known as the Citizens for Victory, of 8 West Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y. This organization is responsible for many full-page attacks on Congress which appeared in the metropolitan press. For example, I hold here a photostatic copy of a page from the New York Herald Tribune of May 18, 1942, sponsored by the Citizens for Victory. The headline is "Will you help stop votes for Hitler?" The entire page is devoted to an attack upon Congress. They ran a number of such spreads, copies of which I have here. The Citizens for Victory, like the other purge groups, also issued a supplement on the voting records of the Members of the last Congress. I want to read you some excerpts from a letter, dated June 17, 1942, written on the letterhead of the Citizens for Victory, and signed by Frederick C. McKee, treasurer:

> Thank you very much for your recent contribution to Citizens for Victory. Your donation, along with the hundreds of others we have received, will aid us greatly in our fight against the appeasers, defeatists, and obstructionists who are still trying to block America's efforts to wage a truly total war.
> Citizens for Victory is convinced that the American public is tired of politics as usual, time wasting, and weak-kneed appeasement, both in and out of Congress. We know that the American people, when made to realize the crucial importance of this year's elections, will flatly repudiate the cowardly policies of the defeatists and obstructionists at the polls.
> I am enclosing the record of the votes of the Congressmen of your State and district upon 10 major issues before the war. From a glance over the records of some of the more unfavorable Congressmen you will see how important it is that they not be allowed to have another chance to be wrong.

If you will examine this letterhead, you will find listed as vice chairman one Clark M. Eichelberger. Besides being the directing genius of several of the purge groups, Mr. Eichelberger is a consultant in the State Department, at $25 per day.

Mr. McKee, who is treasurer of the Citizens for Victory, who writes so freely about the fight against "appeasers, defeatists, and obstructionists," and so enthusiastically about waging a "truly total war," is also secretary and treasurer of the National Casket Co.

It is also significant to point out at this time that one of the highest-paid officials of the Citizens for Victory is one Jay Lovestone, who was formerly general secretary of the Communist Party in the United States.

Most of the officials who make up the Citizens for Victory and the Union for Democratic Action have one main objective: That is to discredit Congress in order that their program of internationalism will not be hampered after the war by a strong and alert Congress.

The next purge organization I should like to take up is the Coordinating Committee for Democratic Action, of 103 Park Avenue, New York City. This organization on December 30, 1942, merged with the Friends of Democracy, Inc., to form one national organization to be known as Friends of Democracy.

The Coordinating Committee for Democratic Action, like its coconspirators, the Union for Democratic Action, the Citizens for Victory, and the New Republic, issued a special supplement to the public on the so-called voting records of the Members of the Seventy-seventh Congress. It, like the Union for Democratic Action-New Republic supplement, attacked Members as obstructionists and Fascists in an effort to undermine the people's faith in Congress.

This organization, like all the other purge organizations, has been thoroughly investigated by our committee, and while I intend to incorporate the details of this investigation into a special report, I would like to bring to your attention a few of the facts disclosed during the course of our investigation.

I hold here in my hand the supplement on Congress, issued by this organization, entitled "Your Congressman and Pearl Harbor," and call your attention to the language in the second paragraph, wherein they state that certain Members of Congress "felt a kinship for the attackers and obstructed all measures."

From another supplement, which they issued on May 12, I call your attention to the following language:

> The Coordinating Committee took no part whatsoever in the controversy prior to Pearl Harbor over the United States entry into war. However, as part of the organization's regular procedure, it observed all pro-Fascist groups and tendencies and noted carefully the attempts to use high office and even the floor of Congress as a forum for working against democracy.

In the issue of their publication, The City Reporter, dated January 6, 1942, the following statement is made:

> Both Senators and Representatives cooperated intimately with Fascist groups.

I have cited these excerpts from the official publication of this organization in order that you might see the vicious propaganda that has been circulated against Congress, as a body, and which could only raise suspicion and doubt in the minds of the people.

It may, or may not, surprise you to learn that the telephone and telegraph records of this organization reveal that they were in close touch with officials of this Government. For example, I hold here the long-distance telephone record of the calls made from New York to Washington, which shows that officials of the organization were in frequent communication with Gardner Jackson, Principal Economist of the Department of Agriculture. Several of the calls were taken by Mr. Jackson on a Government phone at the Department of Agriculture, and still other telephone records show that Morris Rosenblatt, executive secretary of the organization, received calls at Mr. Jackson's office in the Department of Agriculture, from his secretary in New York in July 1942, which was prior to the election. There are also telephone calls to Mr. R. Keith Kane, at that time Assistant Director of the Office of Facts and Figures, and now with O. W. I. There are also telephone calls to Mr. Morris Rosenthal, Assistant Director in charge of Office of Imports, Board of Economic Warfare.

I hold here in my hand original telegrams from Morris Rosenblatt, executive secretary of the organization, to Gardner Jackson, and William Lewis, Assistant Director of the Office of Facts and Figures, and I ask unanimous consent to include these four telegrams in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, all of these organizations, the Union for Democratic Action, the Citizens for Victory, and the New Republic, and many more whose records I have here this afternoon, sought by hundreds of thousands of pamphlets and magazines to create the impression throughout the country that the majority of the Members of this House were pro-Axis. Why did they do that? What was the reason that Marshall Field would contribute large sums of money to known pro-Communist and purge organizations? Here is a man who parades himself as a liberal. Here is a man who, by his great wealth, is financing publications and organizations that attack not one Member, not five Members, but the majority of the Members of this House as secret sympathizers and agents of our enemies. Why would he do that? Is he sincerely a liberal—this man who is making millions of dollars every year? Last year, when he was contributing money to Communist organizations, he spent $120,000 to maintain his racing stable; $120,000 for a playboy's fad. I wonder if all the farmers in the county in which I live make $120,000 a year. Yet here is this man in company with Arthur Goldsmith, another very rich man, who has contributed to this campaign, and William F. Cochran, a man with an enormous income in this country, who has likewise contributed. Mr. Speaker, it reminds me of the days of my youth when I read those never-to-be-forgotten Lives of Plutarch, including the life of Julius Caesar, who was descended from an aristocratic family and who began his political career under the handicap of being denounced by the rabble as a reactionary, and who felt himself, therefore, compelled to outdemagogue the worst demagogues which Rome produced, and who undertook, by handing out large sums in bounties, free dispensations, and all sorts of free money to achieve a greater degree of popularity than his demagogic rivals who flourished during the decadent days of the Roman Republic. It is sheer hypocrisy for men to pose as defenders of the poor and then to denounce Members of Congress, the overwhelming majority of whom are not wealthy. Nevertheless, these self-chosen defenders of the poor, such as Marshall Field, depict the Members of Congress as great reactionaries and economic royalists, while Marshall Field himself, in turn, pretends a love for the poor so great that he disburses millions in order that his magazines and other publications may defame and smear the honesty and integrity of men who serve in this body because they love America and who, throughout this emergency, have demonstrated the fact that when a crisis does arise in America all men of every party, Democrats and Republicans, rally to the defense of their country.

Mr. Speaker, when I first announced that I was going to make this speech it was my intention to take up the many details, and to show you check by check of, for instance, the Robert Marshall Foundation; how here was Gardner Jackson, sitting in the Department of Agriculture until a few days ago, writing check after check to organizations that the Department of Justice and Mr. Biddle said were clearly Communist organizations; organizations that for a period of 3 or 4 years directed their main attack upon the honesty and patriotism of a majority of the Members of this House. I intended, Mr. Speaker, to show you something about the Twentieth Century Fund. I intended to take up one by one these benefactors of totalitarianism who live in great wealth and luxury and live under circumstances that would appear unbelievable to the people of your district and my district, or to you and to me; nevertheless, they have the effrontery to use their wealth in order to attempt to create the impression in this dark hour that there are Members, or even one Member, of this House who secretly wants the Axis Powers to win; men whose boys like those of my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], two of his boys are in the armed forces of this country; my own boy who volunteered; my nephew who this day is in Africa fighting for his country. I know many Members in this House whose loved ones are now engaged in this stupendous struggle. Yet here are all these so-called proponents of liberalism, who would reverse nineteenth-century liberalism and who would make of it an entirely different philosophy from what it was always understood to be. Instead of fighting against centralized government they would centralize government. Instead of protecting and safeguarding the individual against a growing bureaucracy that threatens our very liberty, they are using their influence to increase it.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I have not said that we have yet reached bureaucracy in the literal sense, for bureaucracy is government by bureaus. What I do say, Mr. Speaker, is that we are rapidly approaching a period in America when the real power and function of government will not be exercised in this Chamber, but it will be exercised by bureaucracy. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this Congress is the chief bulwark of freedom in America. I denounce all organizations or groups who seek by sweeping statements and denunciations to create the impression that a majority of the Members of this House are not loyal to their country.

Why do they do it? Why was this organized attack against me revived a week ago? We should try to arrive at a correct answer; let us do so by the process of elimination.

Is it because some of the racial minorities fear that the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, may be prejudiced? I am convinced that could not be the true answer, for they have investigated my record from the time I was a little boy until the present time. I know of no man in this House who has been investigated more frequently and more exhaustively than I. Do you know what they found, Mr. Speaker, when they sent representatives of the New Republic and of these organizations into my home county? They asked some of the citizens: "Was not MARTIN DIES anti-Jewish?"

And a Jew said to them, a Jew who lives around the corner, whose wife is one of the sweetest women who ever lived, both of whom have been my constant friends for many years—this Jew said to him:

"MARTIN DIES! Why," he said, "friend, do you not know that MARTIN DIES was one of the few men in Texas who during the power of the Ku Klux Klan, when the Klan controlled almost every political office in the State, when few dared stand out and speak against this illiberalism when the Klan became the controlling factor in this State, do you know that MARTIN DIES stood on the stump and throughout this country denounced the Ku Klux Klan, when he was burned in effigy, when his law firm was being boycotted by the Ku Klux Klan?

"Do you know that MARTIN DIES walked into the courthouse at Orange, Tex., and defended Mr. Gloudeman, a Catholic who could not get a lawyer anywhere in the district—defended him against unjust charges when the courthouse was filled with Klansmen and when the Klan hired a special prosecutor to prosecute the case?"

They then asked some of my fellow townsmen: "Well, is he not anti-Negro, living down here?" "Anti-Negro," they said, "why, when Ben Wilkes was indicted by a grand jury as an accessory to crime after his boy had killed three white men and when Ben Wilkes could not get a lawyer in Texas or anywhere else to go into the courtroom and defend him, MARTIN DIES went there and defended him and protected him against any possibility of lynching and cleared him. No, you cannot make a case of intolerance against him, for he and his father before him have been outstanding advocates of the recognition of the fundamental rights of every man, woman, and child in all America."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this vehement and unrestrained attack upon me and upon, as I shall show later, other Members of Congress is not inspired by fear of intolerance. Is it that they fear we are opposed to measures necessary to win this war and establish a lasting peace?

Mr. Speaker, there are two kinds of isolationists in America: There was the isolationist before Pearl Harbor who was a sincere American who honestly believed that the best interests of this country could be served by maintaining strict neutrality, but who after Pearl Harbor abandoned isolationism and became a strong advocate of war measures. That is the type of isolationist who is constantly attacked in all these publications. But there is another type of isolationist, the ones who joined the American Peace Mobilization, which picketed the White House, the ones who opposed all measures to prepare America. They abandoned this isolationism only after Adolf Hitler invaded Russia. Strange to say in all these publications and in all these attacks there is no denunciation of this type of isolationist before Hitler's attack on Russia. There is not a single instance where any of these leaders of isolation before the break between Hitler and Stalin has ever been denounced or criticized in these publications; and, certainly, Mr. Speaker, my own record in that regard stands out above any criticism, for I have a record of 100 percent support of war measures, having supported every appropriation to protect and defend this country, having supported lend-lease under which aid was extended to Russia; so, therefore, there can be no real ground for opposition based upon that.

Then why this concerted attack timed appropriately after the Rules Committee postponed the hearing on our resolution for extension from last Friday until some future date? Why did Drew Pearson say over the radio last night that the National Lawyers' Guild would attack me today as an agent—a secret agent—of Hitler? Why did Walter Winchell last night time his insinuations at this particular moment? Why should the C. I. O. send out a letter to every Member of Congress and charge our committee with being a friend of totalitarianism and of Hitler?

I will tell you what is behind it, Mr. Speaker. There has been for 4 or 5 years a well-organized attempt to build up in this country a united front of radicals—a united front of Communists, crackpots, Socialists, men of different shades of totalitarian beliefs; there has been a well-organized attempt to bring within the sphere of their influence the Negro population of this country by appeals in publications that I could read to you. Constantly the Negroes are told that now is the time for them to achieve that degree of social equality to which they are entitled.

In the People's Voice, not long ago, A. Clayton Powell, a Negro Communist, advocated that I be assassinated—that my death was as desirable as Hitler's. Immediately other publications took it up and throughout the Negro press there was a most vicious denunciation, not only of me but of Congress.

What do they hope to gain by that? We in our country live in peace with the Negro; we respect him, for he has contributed much to the progress of our country. I have made hundreds of speeches in this country, and in many speeches I have said to the American people that the great majority of the Negroes are loyal, patriotic American citizens.

Why, then, Mr. Speaker, is this united front of radicals and crackpots so desirous of creating hatred and bitterness between the white and the colored races? Why are they making this appeal through racial publications?

I wish I had the time to read the translations of some of the foreign language newspapers and magazines published in this country in which we of the South are invariably held up as bigoted and intolerant and as naturally opposed to them because of their birth. I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. The real reason is that there are people in this country who do not believe in America and who have never believed in it. They use the word "democracy" to cloak a brand of totalitarianism that is as vicious as any that ever thrived on European soil. What they believe in, Mr. Speaker, is government by bureaus, government with great centralized power, government in which they say that economic life will be regimented; true, but they are going to stop after having regimented the country economically and after having tried to do with economics what they accused others of trying to do with prohibition, namely, force everybody to be good by a paternalistic government. They say, "After we have done that we will stop and not bother your religion. We are going to give you the Bill of Rights, we will outrage and defile a part of the Constitution, but we will guarantee that we will not interfere with your religious and personal rights."

Mr. Speaker, the history of the world has always shown that free enterprise is the basic foundation of all democracy. When people are regimented economically, then the next step is to regiment them politically and religiously. When any group of supermen or social planners get control of government and impose their fanatical beliefs, they become avaricious for power and they subjugate the whole body politic.

Mr. Speaker, how can there be a free America if we attempt to build a gigantic bureaucracy in which we in Congress become powerless? Tell me bureaucracy does not wield great power in this country? Did I not go through an election and see how the long tentacles of bureaucracy could reach out into every county through Farm Security, W. P. A., and through this vicious practice of blanket authority to the Executive? I say it is wrong.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I wonder if the gentleman has noticed lately that these crackpots led by a man by the name of I. F. Stone, of PM, I think his name is Feinstein, are now attacking and attempting to besmirch Cordell Hull, Secretary of State.

Mr. DIES. We have the telegrams here of these purge groups. We have telegrams from purgers like Frederick C. McKee, who parades as a great patriot. He is identified with six of these purge-Congress organizations. He is for weeding out and purging Congress of everyone who does not share his view.

Here is what he said in a letter. Let me read an excerpt:

> Citizens for Victory is convinced that the American public is tired of politics-as-usual, time wasting, and weak-kneed appeasement, both in and out of Congress. We know that the American people, when made to realize the crucial importance of this year's elections, will flatly repudiate the cowardly policies of the defeatists and obstructionists at the polls.

Mr. McKee is treasurer of this organization, the Citizens for Victory, and director of the biggest casket company in the United States.

The Citizens for Victory organization distributed throughout this country the pamphlet entitled "Will You Help Stop Votes for Hitler?" Think of it, Mr. Speaker. The majority of the Members of this Congress are accused openly in the pamphlet of voting for Hitler. That is not construed as sedition, and they are not prosecuted for it.

Mr. Speaker, I am trying to drive a point home, and I speak with all the sincerity in my heart, for I have often been on the unpopular side of many questions. I was on the unpopular side of the Ku Klux Klan. I was on the unpopular side of many questions in this House. But of one thing I am absolutely certain and that is that the greatest responsibility lies on this Congress, not only to maintain our prerogatives, but to restore the rights that have been taken away from the Congress of the United States.

How has this been accomplished? One, by blanket appropriations. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], and I, led the first revolt in the Rules Committee against the first blanket appropriation of $4,000,000,000. We refused to vote for a rule on it for we then foresaw that whenever the Executive is given unlimited and blanket authority to use public funds, the Executive, whether Democratic, Republican, or whatnot, will find it impossible to resist political pressure. So that I believe, Mr. Speaker, that through blanket appropriations, through the right of bureaus to issue rules and regulations under which they become legislators for the country, this powerful bureaucracy has become entrenched. Why not be perfectly frank? Let us say to the American people what we all know, with few exceptions. When we call up the bureaucrats, what man in this House receives even ordinary courtesy? Why should they be courteous, when they feel that they are the real power in America, that they are the ones who administer the funds? They believe that we must come crawling on our knees to them in order to get jobs for needy constituents who are constantly pressing us for employment. We must come to them for public works appropriations in our districts in order to save ourselves from the charge that we have no influence in the city of Washington.

Bureaucracy, Mr. Speaker? It is as deadly and poisonous as any form of fascism there is and is as destructive of the freedom and the liberty of the American Nation as anything could possibly be. What does it lead to? Certainly there is no point in speaking in general terms in our denunciation of bureaucracy. Certainly we gain no end when we simply denounce it in general terms.

Let us be specific. Let us find out, Mr. Speaker, what bureaucracy leads to, how it is possible for men to secure positions with fat salaries in a bureaucratic set-up when they could not be elected dog catcher in any Congressman's district in this Capitol.

I speak frankly, Mr. Speaker, for I conceive it to be my duty to my boy and to the boys of my friends and the people of my district during this critical hour to be perfectly frank.

I admire one thing about the British Parliament—that during the whole course of this struggle the Parliament of England has insisted at all times on its right and its freedom to criticize, not destructive criticism, not attempts to thwart the war effort, not sweeping generalities that seek to condemn this branch of the service or that branch or to repeat rumors and lies, but truthful assertions based upon facts that are incontestable. So I shall descend or ascend, as you may wish to term it, from generalities to specific examples.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. All the gentleman says is well and good, I may say to my colleague, but I wish he would explain one thing. If this is a nonpartisan matter, why is it that in the middle of last summer, when we were going to have our State Democratic convention out there and we expected to see in the papers that the Speaker and majority leader would come out to speak to us—and we were all glad of it, because they would make good speeches—why did the gentleman's party send this loud-mouth Holland out there to repeat all the things the gentleman is now saying were said against the Members of Congress?

Mr. DIES. My party did not do it.

Mr. Speaker, I take first the case of Frederick L. Schuman. I intend to read the names and positions and records of many of the bureaucrats who have wormed their way into this bureaucratic set-up, in order to make crystal clear just what we mean by irresponsible, unrepresentative, crackpot, radical bureaucrats.

Schuman is chief political analyst of the Federal Communications Commission, at a salary of $5,600 a year. Think of it. How many men in your district get $5,600 a year? The district judge in my district, who serves five counties and has the responsibility of dealing with life and death, does not receive $5,600 a year. Not 5 percent of the lawyers in my district get $5,600 a year. As for the farmers, why, Mr. Speaker, out of all the farmers in my district there are not half a dozen who get $1,000 a year after they have worked in sleet and wind and rain and in the heat of the midday sun, after they have battled insects and drought and everything else. To come out with $1,000 a year would make them feel like "economic royalists."

Schuman is a man of violent political views. His Communist affiliations are a matter of public record. He belonged to the group which organized itself under the name of the League of Professional Groups for Foster and Ford. Foster and Ford were the Communist candidates for President and Vice President, respectively. This League of Professional Groups for Foster and Ford issued a pamphlet, which I hold in my hand. Over the name of Frederick L. Shuman and others, the following statement appears:

> We call upon all men and women—especially workers in the professions and the arts—to join in the revolutionary struggle against capitalism under the leadership of the Communist Party.

There are no if's, but's, or and's about this statement. Schuman, the chief political analyst of the Federal Communications Commission, signed it and will undoubtedly step up as a man and admit his participation in a revolutionary movement aimed at the overthrow of our American form of government.

How would you like to go back to your constituents, to that father and that mother who have just received word that their dearly beloved son has given his life in defense of America, how would you like to stand up on the stump, Democrat or Republican, and attempt to defend the appointment by bureaucracy of a man who does not believe in the system these boys fought and died to preserve?

In my own little town, three of the boys who grew up with my boys, who used to play on my front porch and in my yard, have all made the supreme sacrifice. For what? For bureaucracy, for totalitarianism, for socialism, for crackpotism? No, Mr. Speaker; for the American way of life and the American Constitution.

Here is the case of Goodwin B. Watson. Watson is Chief Broadcast Analyst of the Federal Communications Commission, at a salary of $6,500. In a letter which I sent to Chairman Fly on November 18, 1941, I called attention to Goodwin Watson's long record of Communist views and his numerous affiliations with Communist-front organizations. As a result of that exposure this House once refused to allow any portion of the appropriations of the Federal Communications Commission to be used to pay the salary of Goodwin Watson. Since that time Watson's salary has been raised from $5,600 to $6,500 a year.

In an article which he wrote for a magazine known as the World Tomorrow, Watson lumped Coueism, pyorrhea, and Congress together as some of the great jokes of the age.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has referred to a constituent of mine. I am in entire accord with what the gentleman from Texas has said, but I would like to know who appointed Mr. Watson to this office, and who appointed these other revolutionists?

Mr. DIES. Wait until I get through. In Common Sense magazine, Watson went on record as favoring a sudden, complete, and violent, that is, Communist, change from our present form of society to a Socialist society. In this article, he categorically rejected the idea of a gradual shift from capitalism to socialism. No amount of sophistry can explain away Watson's favorable views on communism as he himself publicly expressed them before he came down to Washington to draw his $6,500 salary as one of our host of radical bureaucrats.

Watson is a fit associate of Frederick L. Schuman of whom I have already spoken, but neither one is qualified on the basis of his publicly declared beliefs to hold a Government position.

Here are four folders of exhibits which contain a fairly complete documentation of Goodwin Watson's Communist views and affiliations. I shall be glad to turn this evidence over to the committee which this House has recently set up for the investigation of the Federal Communications Commission.

William E. Dodd, Jr., is employed by the Federal Communications Commission at a salary of $3,200 a year. Dodd was recently refused a visa by the State Department when he was assigned a commission which would take him to England. This refusal of a visa by the State Department was based upon information furnished the Department by our committee and the F. B. I. Among his many activities on behalf Communist Front organizations. Dodd was a secretary of the American League for Peace and Democracy which the Attorney General branded as subversive.

I shall be glad to turn this evidence over to the committee that this House has recently set up for the investigation of the Federal Communications Commission. And may I digress long enough to answer perhaps the question you are being asked, and that is, Why not let the Communists have a Government job, are they not fighting valiantly in resisting the Axis brutality and atrocities? Why is it we should not hire them? Mr. Speaker, there is not a Member of this House who from the beginning has not hoped and prayed that Russia would be successful in resisting this brutal unprovoked attack upon her sovereignty, and her soil. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I care not what kind of a government Russia has. I did not care what kind of a government Germany has, if Germany had not sought to impose that kind of government upon the peoples of other lands and upon my own land. I am not a maudlin internationalist who believes that I or my Government can go all over the world and make people democratic, whether they want to be democratic or not. I do not mean by that that I do share the views of extreme nationalism that has been the curse of many countries. I do not believe in extreme internationalism or extreme nationalism, but I do believe that every true American must put his own country and his own country's interests above that of every other country in the world. I have nothing but praise for the heroism and the courage of the Russian people. I would not under any circumstances sanction, indeed, I would resist, any attempt by our own citizens to go into Russia and seek to impose Americanism upon those people. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there is a vast distinction between the Communists in Russia and the Communists in America. The Communists in Russia are loyal to Russia, they are fighting and dying for Russia, but the Communists in America had to wait until Hitler attacked Russia before they would come to the aid of America. So, Mr. Speaker, I conceive that it is the right of the people of this country to demand not that they shall not believe in communism, because that is an inherent right of every citizen, but I believe it is right to say to them, and to say to the Government, "You have no right to take the hard-earned tax money of the loyal, patriotic people in my district, and to give it to people who are on record against the very Government that is supporting them."

Now let us take the case of Paul R. Porter. This man is chief of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Branch of W. P. B. at a salary of $8,000 a year.

Think of that, my fellow Members of the House. Most of you represent ordinary and average districts in this Congress. Most of you know that even the bank cashiers, that even the presidents of banks in your small towns and villages never earned $8,000 a year, and to the workmen, the workers on the farms and in the factories who are laboring constantly to preserve this Government, $8,000 a year would seem almost a dream to them, something never to be realized. Yet here is a bureaucracy that is able to take this man and pay him $8,000 a year.

Throughout most of his adulthood Paul R. Porter has been a Socialist, one of the leading Socialists in the United States. Porter has made no secret about his socialism. To cite only a single passage from his prolific Socialist writings, he has said:

> Nothing less than a Socialist revolution will free labor from insecurity and industrial serfdom.

Furthermore, here is a copy of the New Republic's supplement, issued jointly by that magazine and the Union for Democratic Action, which attacked the Congress of the United States and was used as campaign document No. 1 in the purge organizations' efforts to defeat a large part of this House in the recent elections. You are familiar with this document. It was distributed all over your districts by the so-called purge groups and by the C. I. O. A million copies were scattered over this whole country. Replete with lies and libels, it sought to undermine the confidence of the people of this country in the legislative branch of their Government. I also have here a copy of the letterhead of the Union for Democratic Action, the organization which prepared this scurrilous attack upon Congress. On this letterhead the name of Paul Porter appears as a member of the national executive committee of the Union for Democratic Action. I also hold in my hand two telegrams from the national office of the Union for Democratic Action which show that Mrs. Paul R. Porter was in charge of the Washington Office of the Union for Democratic Action. Now I want to know how long we are going to sit here supinely and vote billions of dollars, much of which is used for the payment of large salaries to Government bureaucrats who are working to smear Congress and the Members of Congress. Where, by the way, is the Hatch Act? If, in the face of this gigantic bureaucracy, we have lifted our voices in vain to the executive departments and war agencies, it is still our constitutional prerogative and responsibility to appropriate the funds with which these departments and agencies operate.

In the case of another member of this gigantic Government bureaucracy, I want you to participate in a guessing game. I want you to try to guess who made the following statement:

> I believe in the abolition of the capitalist system. I believe in the necessity of the destruction of this system of exploitation by the might of workers' organizations.

Now, do you think that statement was made by Earl Browder? Or Karl Marx? Or Lenin, possibly? No; that statement comes from the pen of the principal business consultant in the Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs! His name is John Herling. He draws an annual salary of $5,600 as principal business consultant. The circumstances under which Herling wrote his statement expressing his belief in the "destruction" of our American system are most interesting. Early in the life of this administration, John Herling was offered a position in the Government here in Washington. In a letter which he published over his own name and a copy of which I hold in my hand, Herling contemptuously rejected the offer of a Government post, saying, among other things:

> I believe in the abolition of the capitalist system. I believe in the necessity of the destruction of this system of exploitation by the might of workers' organizations. * * * I decline to be even an insignificant member of a government which, after a year of displaying its brand of social engineering, has devised such a positive, direct, and universal scheme for workers' enslavement. * * * Nor can I entertain the elaborate rationalizations with which some radicals have spun their ways into various sections of the Roosevelt administration.

Despite his one-time emphatic and contemptuous rejection of a position in this administration, John Herling relented and accepted a $5,600 salary in a post which he occupies today. Did he finally decide that he could further his belief in the destruction of the capitalist system better by working inside the Government than by working outside?

Let us take up the case of Paul F. Brissenden who is employed as a consultant in the shipbuilding stabilization committee of the War Production Board at a salary of $8,000 a year. In March 1941, when the whole country, including official Washington, was becoming aroused over the Communist-led sabotage strikes on our major defense industries, Paul Brissenden and others issued a defense of the Communist Party which filled almost an entire page of the Daily Worker. Brissenden also signed a public manifesto supporting the appointment of the avowed Communist, Simon Gerson, as assistant to the borough president of Manhattan. Furthermore, Brissenden was a member of the national committee of the International Juridical Association, a Communist front organization whose leaders were mostly well-known Communists and Communist fellow travelers. Brissenden was also a sponsor of the National Congress for Unemployment and Social Insurance, an organization which was led by the well-known and avowed Communist Party leader, Herbert Benjamin. Associated with Brissenden as sponsors of this organization were Earl Browder, William Z. Foster, Israel

Amter, and many other equally well-known Communists. Despite whatever pretension of liberalism Brissenden may make, the record shows that he has been a long-time defender of the Communist Party and a frequent sponsor of the party's fronts. Now we confer upon him the distinction of an $8,000 position in the War Production Board.

I do not want to tire you by attempting to read all of these examples. I have some 50 here, and 50 more over there, and I can multiply them, but I am giving you some of the leading examples, so that when you and I return to our war-worn and weary overtaxed constituency, when they ask us what we did in the great city of Washington, we can stand proudly before them and say, "Well, I attended to my job, and I stood idly by and let the bureaucrats, like Paul R. Porter, take over."

Take the case of David J. Saposs. Several years ago our committee received testimony in which it was established that Saposs had been a leader in a revolutionary organization whose avowed objective was for the "workers to take control of industry and Government and build a workers' republic." At that time Saposs was Chief Economist of the National Labor Relations Board. As the result of our exposure Saposs was removed from the N. L. R. B. Now we find that Saposs has recently been made assistant to the chief of the labor division of the War Production Board at a salary of $8,000 a year.

In Labor Age, a magazine of the revolutionary group with which Saposs was prominently identified, he gave expression to the following un-American and revolutionary position:

> But bourgeois democracy is a sham. When it is evident that socialism is the only remedy, it is not worth saving a democracy in which Socialist Parties only collaborate with capitalism * * *. If in the attempt to carry out such a program political action fails, then the workers must unhesitatingly resort to organized force. The (Socialist) International must take the position that if another war occurs the workers will destroy capitalism. With that end in view the workers must be prepared to stretch arms across the frontiers in case of war and definitely win power for themselves.

At no time did we charge that Saposs was a Communist or a member of the Communist Party. It will, however, be perfectly clear to any student of the revolutionary ideologies, that the foregoing statement by Saposs was couched in the strictest Marxian terms.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. COLMER. Is this Dr. Saposs the same man that this House of Representatives provided should not be paid out of the appropriations?

Mr. DIES. That is correct, and that is an illustration of the arrogance which characterizes men who do not need to face a constituency to account for their actions.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman, but I just want to keep the record straight. The gentleman spoke about government by bureaucracy and said that it had not yet arrived. Perhaps strictly speaking that is true, but the lawyers of this country today who wish to advise their clients, do not go to the statutes for the law, but they go to the regulations of the departments. That is almost government by bureaucracy.

Mr. DIES. Now, I have here the very special case of Maurice Parmelee. Almost a year ago, I addressed a letter to the Vice President calling his attention to the record of Parmelee, who was at that time employed in the Board of Economic Warfare at a salary of $5,600. I cited the fact that Parmelee had written numerous volumes—all of them revolutionary in character—and that one of them, entitled "Nudism in Modern Life," advocated the practice of universal nudism in office and factory. I called the Vice President's attention to the fact that Parmelee's book contained 35 photographs, all of which are obscene, and that the volume was an attack upon the moral structure of our society and upon the church and religion. In the nudist society which Parmelee envisaged:

> Convent and monastery, harem and military barracks, clubs and schools exclusively for each sex will disappear, and the sexes will live a more normal and happier life together.

Think of that, Mr. DOUGHTON. In that God-fearing district of yours, in the mountains of North Carolina, where people still go to the church-house and still believe in God and in religion, those God-fearing people that you have the honor to represent and have so ably represented for so many years, what would they think if excerpts of this lewd and filthy book were read from the stump and they were told that their money was being used and their boys were giving their all in order to make it possible for this man to use his talents and his pen in order to undermine the very basis of all democracies, which is the belief of people, not in the materialism of Karl Marx, but in the divine guidance of Almighty God?

Almost immediately after my exposure of Parmelee's activities—which included several years spent in European nudist camps—he was dismissed from the Board of Economic Warfare. The great bureaucratic fraternity was, however, not to leave Parmelee jobless for long. He is now employed as an economist by the Railroad Retirement Board at a salary of $4,600. Time and again, a similar thing has occurred—a bureaucrat exposed in one agency, and fired as a result of that exposure, has been picked up by another agency of the Government. The contempt which these bureaucrats have for the Congress which appropriates their salaries is unbounded.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I wonder if the gentleman would tell the House who it is that is responsible for these appointments that he has mentioned?

Mr. DIES. I will come to that in a moment. I want to give you some typical examples, because I want to hammer this thing home.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Please let me proceed for a moment. I would like to conclude this.

Now take Harold Loeb. On January 15, 1942, I spread the record of Harold Loeb before this House. He was then business specialist in O. P. A. He was let out of O. P. A. but not out of the Government service. Today Harold Loeb is senior economist in building materials for the War Production Board at a salary of $4,600.

I know this is a matter that would be of vital interest to your constituents. I know that during these trying hours when they are all working and sacrificing to produce materials of war, in factories and on the farms, I know that the boys in the foxholes at Guadalcanal, faced by an insidious and brutal enemy, shot at almost constantly, in rags and in filth after the long stay in the foxholes, often with food not cooked, not warm—I wonder if that boy this afternoon as he lies there waiting for the enemy to show his head would get much consolation by knowing that at home, on the home front, in the battle of democracy here in America, a gigantic bureaucracy which he is called upon to fight for has given a job to the author of the following books:

The Professors Like Vodka, Doodab.

Think of a heavyweight, an economic adviser, a social planner, a superman—behold the mountain labored and there came forth Doodab.

Tumbling Mustard, Life in a Technocracy, The Chart of Plenty, Production For Use

The first three of Loeb's books are pornographic novels. I have never read filthier passages in a novel than some of those with which Loeb sprinkled his books. The other three titles of Loeb's books which I have cited are treatises on technocracy. At one time and for a long time, Harold Loeb was No. 1 technocrat in this country. Now, will you please search these 6 books and see if you can find any evidence of Loeb's qualifications for his present position as senior economist in building materials for W. P. B. In one of his technocratic works, Loeb advocated the abolition of money and the substitution therefor of erg certificates to be distributed willy-nilly at the rate of 20,000 a year to every member of society. I know of no man who could better qualify for the title of perfect crackpot, but he is the kind of Washington crackpot for whom we sit here and vote millions of dollars in salaries. I want to know when we are going to cry halt to this business.

I now take up the case of Sam Schmerler. In 1935, Schmerler was dismissed from his position in the Federal Bureau of Investigation on account of his Communist activities. In the space of a few weeks, Schmerler found employment in the Social Security Board. There he worked for several years, meanwhile carrying on his outside radical activities as usual. Then in 1940, when the Communists launched the American Peace Mobilization, Sam Schmerler became one of the organization's leading promoters here in the Nation's Capital. Schmerler was in charge of arrangements for the Washington delegates to the Chicago convention which launched the American Peace Mobilization. Shortly after that, when the Peace Mobilization was urging and supporting sabotage strikes in our major defense industries, and when the peace mobilizers were picketing the White House, Schmerler was still an outstanding leader in the movement. At that time he was drawing a salary of $2,600. Where is he today? Did the Attorney General's investigation lead to Schmerler's dismissal from Government service? Not at all. Sam Schmerler has been rewarded with a promotion. Today he is a Social Security policy consultant at a salary of $3,800. There is not the slightest doubt that Sam Schmerler is a Communist. There is not the slightest doubt that his Communist activities have been consciously directed against the welfare and safety of the United States Government which employs him. Nevertheless and notwithstanding, Sam Schmerler has been rewarded with a $1,200 increase in salary since the time of his outrageous and disgraceful activities in the American Peace Mobilization. Our committee first exposed Schmerler in 1939 as a member of the American League for Peace and Democracy. Furthermore, we sent his name to the Attorney General in October 1941 as one of the now famous list of 1,124 Government employees having affiliations with subversive organizations.

On September 8, 1941, I addressed a letter to the President in which I cited a small part of the record of Emil Jack Lever. At that time Lever was principal field representative of the Labor Division of O. P. M. at a salary of $5,600. Here again, we are face to face with an old story. Since my exposure of Lever, his salary has been upped to $6,500 a year and his present title is that of head labor adviser in the War Production Board.

I have here a voluminous documented record of Emil Jack Lever's Communist views, affiliations, and activities. I do not need to cite more than one of them. The rest are available for the inspection of the Appropriations Committee or any other committee of this House that might desire to see them. Lever was national executive committee member and treasurer of an organization whose publicly announced purpose was stated on its own letterhead, as follows:

> It aims to inspire the workers to take control of industry and government, abolish the present capitalist system and build a workers' republic.

I want to know if we are going to sit here supinely and allow a gigantic bureaucracy which has been thoroughly infiltrated by such as Lever to take over this country. If these facts shame us, you will realize that I did not make the facts; I am only reporting them.

Here is the case of David Lasser, about whom this House has heard much before. A few years ago, one of the largest and most influential front organization of the Communist Party in this country was the Workers Alliance. At the height of its influence—and I may add, its mischief—the Workers Alliance was headed by David Lasser. In 1940 Lasser broke with the Communists and denounced the Workers Alliance. But in addition to his past affiliation with and leadership of Communist front organizations, Lasser was also mixed up with technocracy. He was, in fact, editor of a technocracy magazine. Furthermore, as illustrative of his marked tendency toward one form of mental aberration or another, Lasser was president of the Interplanetary Travel Association. Today David Lasser is senior labor economist for the War Production Board at a salary of $4,600.

I come now to the case of Tom Tippett, who is assistant chief of the rent section of O. P. A. at a salary of $5,600. Tippett was one of the leaders in an organization known as the Trade Union Conference for United Action. Associated with Tippett in that organization were Earl Browder, William Z. Foster, and more than a score of other Communist leaders. The printed matter issued by the organization was as rabidly Communist as anything which ever appeared with the party's official imprint. Tippett was a national committee member of yet another organization whose revolutionary objectives were carried on its letterhead in the following language:

> It aims to inspire the workers to take control of industry and government, abolish the present capitalist system and build a workers' republic.

I call your attention to the case of Henry G. Alsberg who is now senior feature writer for the Office of War Information at a salary of $4,600. In the early life of our committee, back in 1938, we exposed the extensive infiltration of Communists into the Federal Writers project. We showed how Communists had used the Writers Project to obtain the Government imprint upon their propaganda. We exposed some of the Communist filth which was put into the official publications of the Federal Writers Project. As a result of our exposure, the Congress abolished the Writers Project. Who was the head of the Federal Writers project? None other than Henry G. Alsberg who has crept back into Government employment in the Office of War Information.

Here is the case of David Karr who is assistant chief of the foreign language division of the Office of War Information at a salary of $4,600. For 2 years, Karr was on the staff of the Communist Party's official newspaper, the Daily Worker. There is not the slightest doubt that all members of the Daily Worker staff were required to be members of the Communist Party. Karr was a writer for the Communist front publication, Equality, whose editorial council was composed largely of well-known Communists and Communist fellow travelers.

David Karr was also public relations director of the American League for Peace and Democracy, one of the Communist fronts which Attorney General Biddle branded as subversive. Karr was a frequent writer for the League's magazine Fight.

Take the case of Guiseppi Facci who is senior foreign language information advisor in the Office of War Information at a salary $4,600. For years, Facci has been active and prominent in the front organizations of the Communist Party in California. He was especially active in the American League Against War and Fascism on the west coast, an organization which the Attorney General branded as subversive. I have his complete record of Communist affiliations here, but I shall not take the time necessary to read it.

Take the case of David Wahl who is associate analyst in the Board of Economic Warfare at a salary of $3,800. David Wahl signed the incorporation papers of the Washington Bookshop, a Communist enterprise which the Attornew General himself branded as subversive. Furthermore, the Cooperative League of Washington expelled the Bookshop from membership in the League on account of its notorious Communist control.

Hugh Miller is senior attorney for the Bituminous Coal Commission of the Department of the Interior at a salary of $4,600 a year. Miller was chairman of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, a Communist front organization which the Attorney General last year branded as subversive. Miller was also a leader of the infamous Communist front known as the American Peace Mobilization which the Attorney General also branded as subversive. Miller's wife, Helen, was dismissed from her position in the Department of Labor because she assailed the President as a Fascist.

Walter Gellhorn, assistant general counsel of the O. P. A. in the New York office at a salary of $8,000, was a lecturer this week at the Communist Party's Workers School. Karl Borders, director of O. P. A. in Hawaii at a salary of $8,000, has a long record of radical activities in Chicago.

Now, let us take the case of Jack Fahy. Fahy is principal liaison officer of the Board of Economic Warfare at a salary of $5,600. Jack Fahy worked in closest sympathy with and support of the Communist Party in Spain for 2 years. In the Daily Worker of October 17, 1938, Jack Fahy's resignation from the Socialist Party was published. His resignation from the Socialist Party was not so much a severance from the Socialists as it was an endorsement of the Communist Party. Anyone may refer back to the files of the Daily Worker and see that this was so. Jack Fahy is now being considered for a transfer to the Department of the Interior, where, if transferred, he is to become Chairman of the Territorial Affairs Bureau at a salary of $6,500 a year.

Nathaniel Weyl is senior economic analyst of the Board of Economic Warfare at a salary of $4,600. For several years Weyl was very prominent in Communist activities among students. His writings in the Student Review, magazine of the National Student League, make it clear beyond the possibility of any slight doubt that Weyl himself was a Communist. His writings in the Communist Party's newspaper, the Daily Worker, also leave no doubt about his being a loyal Communist Party member.

Take the case of Robert Morss Lovett, who is secretary of the Virgin Islands at a salary of $5,800. Only a few men in this country have records of Communist affiliations which are as long as that of Robert Morss Lovett. I shall not take the time to give you his entire record, but here is a part of it:

Lovett was vice chairman of the American League for Peace and Democracy, an organization branded as subversive by the Attorney General. He was a contribulator to New Masses. He was also a member of the advisory board of Champion—magazine of the Young Communist League. He was a member of the advisory board of the American Student Union, a member of the national committee of the Student Congress Against War, a member of the National Committee for Defense of Political Prisoners, a signer of a letter protesting the ban on Communists in the American Civil Liberties Union, a member of the national advisory board of the American Youth Congress, a sponsor of the Mother Bloor birthday celebration, a sponsor of the Emergency Peace Mobilization which launched the American Peace Mobilization, a director of the American Fund for Public Service—better known as the Garland Fund—a sponsor of the National Student League, and a member of the All America Anti-Imperialist League. All of the foregoing organizations and many others with which Lovett was affiliated were Communist controlled.

Here is the case of Merle Vincent, director of the hearings branch in the Department of Labor at a salary of $7,250. Merle Vincent was the first chairman of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, the Communist front organization which the Attorney General branded as subversive. Vincent was also temporary chairman of the National Conference on Constitutional Liberties where the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties was organized, the latter also being on the list of the Attorney General's subversive organizations. I have here a sample of the growing boldness of the radical or pro-Communist bureaucrats. According to a recent issue of the Daily Worker which I hold in my hand, Merle Vincent delivered the first of a series of lectures at the Communist Party's own official Workers School in New York. It is time that we learned that there is a world of difference between our military alliance with Russia on the one hand and taking American Communists to our official bosom on the other hand. Pro-Communist bureaucrats such as Merle Vincent are doing their best to obliterate that all-important distinction. When some of our high Government officials rhapsodize at Communist-controlled meetings on the anniversary of the founding of the Communist regime in Russia, it is pertinent for us to remember that Stalin does not hold pro-American celebrations in Moscow on the Fourth of July. Stalin is a thoroughgoing realist, while some of our officials behave like sentimental fools in coddling those who are wholly disloyal to our own country.

Gardner Jackson, who was principal economist for the Department of Agriculture at a salary of $5,600. Jackson's Communist affiliations have been many. I call attention to only a few of them.

Gardner Jackson was a sponsor of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action. He was a signer of the Call for American Youth Congress. He was a speaker for the Greater New York Emergency Conference on Inalienable Rights. He was a speaker for the Workers' Alliance. He was a member of the American League for Peace and Democracy. All five of the foregoing organizations with which Gardner Jackson has been affiliated were found to be subversive by the Attorney General.

Gardner Jackson was also a signer of a letter protesting the ban on Communists in the American Civil Liberties Union.

In my remarks to this House on September 24, 1942, I proved by checks that the Robert Marshall Foundation has become one of the chief sources of funds with which the numerous Communist front organizations are kept going in their subversive work. I also pointed out that Gardner Jackson is one of the five trustees who dispense these funds.

Alice Barrows is educationist, specialist in school buildings, for the Office of Education at a salary of $4,800 a year. Alice Barrows was vice chairman of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, a Communist front organization which the Attorney General branded as subversive. She was also a member of the national committee of the American League for Peace and Democracy, another on the list of the Attorney General's subversive organizations.

Now, take the case of William Pickens, who is principal securities promotion specialist for the Treasury Department at a salary of $5,600. Pickens signed a manifest in defense of the notorious Communist Sam Darcy. Pickens was vice chairman of the American League Against War and Fascism, which the Attorney General branded as subversive. He was also a contributor to the Communist Party's New Masses. He was a sponsor of the Greater New York Emergency Conference on Inalienable Rights, a section of the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties which the Attorney General also found to be subversive. Pickens was a sponsor of the American Committee for Protection of Foreign-Born, a speaker for the United States Congress Against War, and a sponsor of the American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom.

Arthur F. Goldschmidt, special assistant to the Secretary of the Interior at a salary of $6,500, and Marcus I. Goldman, employed by the Department of the Interior at a salary of $4,000, were both active members of the American League for Peace and Democracy and of the Washington Bookshop. Both of these organizations were found to be subversive by the Attorney General.

Leonard Emil Mins is employed by the Office of Strategic Services at a salary of $4,000 a year. Mins and his father before him have been big shots in the Communist Party. Leonard Mins worked for the Communist International in Moscow for several years. He has been an active Communist since 1930. He has written for the New Masses and the Daily Worker. He has also been prominent in the League of American Writers, which was branded by the Attorney General as a subversive organization.

Henry T. Hunt, special assistant to the general counsel of the Federal Works Agency at a salary of $5,600 a year, publicly protested against the ban upon Communists which was adopted by the American Civil Liberties Union. Hunt was also officially connected with the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, one of the organizations which the Attorney General found to be subversive. Hunt also has numerous other affiliations with Communist front organizations on his record.

Here is the case of Mary McLeod Bethune who is employed by the National Youth Administration at a salary of $6,250. Mary McLeod Bethune was publicly and prominently affiliated with four of the organizations which the Attorney General branded as subversive. She was national vice chairman of the American League for Peace and Democracy. The other three subversive organizations with which she was affiliated were the American Youth Congress, the National Negro Congress, and the Washington Committee for Democratic Action.

Harry C. Lamberton, head attorney of the Rural Electrification Administration at a salary of $6,500, was chairman of the Washington branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy which the Attorney General branded as subversive. It has been almost 4 years since our committee exposed Lamberton and his 581 fellow Government bureaucrats who were members of the American League for Peace and Democracy. Today we see some of the fruits of the administration's policy of extreme hostility toward and ridicule of our exposure of the American League. As a result of that policy, the radical and crackpot bureaucrats have become more and more bold in their contempt for the Congress of the United States. Furthermore, their number has increased alarmingly. Harry C. Lamberton was also counsel of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, an organization which Attorney General Biddle found to be subversive.

T. A. Bisson, principal economic analyst in the Board of Economic Warfare at a salary of $5,600, was affiliated with the American League for Peace and Democracy. He also contributed numerous articles to the Communist publication, Soviet Russia Today. He was a speaker for the American Student Union, whose former head, Joseph P. Lash, has assured us was a Communist-controlled front organization.

Katherine Kellock is employed in the Board of Economic Warfare at a salary of $3,800 a year. In 1938, our committee exposed the Communist infiltration of the Federal Writers' project. At that time Katherine Kellock was field supervisor in charge of 4,600 Government employees who were at work on the notorious series of Federal Guide Books. The Congress broke up that project, but, like Henry G. Alsberg, who was head of the Federal Writers' project, Katherine Kellock has slipped back into Government employment.

Here is Jay Deiss, senior editor writer of the Federal Security Agency, at a salary of $4,600. Also Milton V. Freeman, Assistant Solicitor of the Securities and Exchange Commission, at a salary of $6,500. And again, George Slaff, principal attorney for the Federal Power Commission, at a salary of $6,000. Here also is A. C. Shire, Director of the Technical Division of the Federal Public Housing Authority, at a salary of $7,500. And to these add the name of Edward Scheunemann, assistant attorney in O. P. A., at a salary of $3,800. Deiss, Freeman, Slaff, Shire, and Scheunemann were all leaders of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action. I hope no one will rise to say that these men's names simply appeared on a mailing list of the organization. Such was not the case; they were officially and publicly identified as leaders of this organization which Attorney General Biddle has branded as subversive.

Mr. Speaker, to read each and every one of these names would impose too much upon the generosity of this House. I could stand here for day in and day out and read you the records of men who have no place in our Government; men, Mr. Speaker, who have gone on record against the kind of thing that the people in your district and in my district believe in with all their hearts and with all their minds. There are many people in my district this afternoon, plain folk; they are not economic experts; they are not learned in all of the philosophies that grace our great universities. They believe in certain fundamental principles. Those people that I have had the honor to represent for seven terms in this House believe in this Constitution that our fathers purchased with their blood and our mothers by their tears. They believe in the preservation of this country, for they know that it is the only country under which every man can be free. If I stood before those people, and took a poll there would not be one hundredth of one percent in my district who would support and sanction the employment of men like some of these holding positions in our Government.

What, then, is the answer?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. We all had on our desk this morning a copy of a statement from the Lawyers' Guild. I wonder if the gentleman is going to discuss that?

Mr. DIES. The National Lawyers' Guild is an organization of radical lawyers, many of whom are employed by this Government. I cannot vouch for the accuracy of the figure, for I have not checked it closely enough, but I have been informed by those in my office that fully one-half of the members of this guild are employed by the Federal Government. It was so rotten that Adolf Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, withdrew from it, saying that it was a Communist organization. It was so rotten that Judge Ferdinand Pecora withdrew from it because of its communistic nature. It was so rotten that Robert Jackson, Attorney General, withdrew from it because of its un-American character.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier in this speech, it is a shrewd tactic for those who really do not believe in democracy to wrap the cloak of democracy and liberalism around themselves and to pretend to go forth to battle for democracy when the thing that they believe in is the very thing that has brought curse and destruction to the republics of other countries and other ages.

So they would like to create the impression that those who expose them are pro-Fascist or pro-Nazi. Since the beginning of this committee, Mr. Speaker, every member of this committee knows there has been but one definite aim and that is to fearlessly expose every form of un-American activity. Three and one-half years before the Government moved against the German-American Bund this committee pointed out to the American people that it was an espionage organization, that its leaders were disloyal to the people of the United States; and in a letter which I addressed to the Attorney General 2½ years ago I called upon him not only to prosecute the German-American Bund, but also the Kyfhauser Bund and numerous other Nazi organizations. With few exceptions, there has not been a conviction in the United States obtained by the Department of Justice, which was not obtained by information from our committee's files. Let us read the record, and I do not do so as a special plea for the committee or in the role of one who is asking you as any favor to me to continue this committee. The committee has been under pressure from the beginning by those who would like to brand everybody as Communists simply because of their progressive views. Thousands of names of people have been submitted to me with the earnest and almost peremptory demand that they be branded as Communists simply because of their radical views. There have also been many people who have demanded that our committee brand as pro-Nazi everyone who has expressed conservative views.

Let me make myself clear, Mr. Speaker; I believe in America, and believing in America, I believe that everyone in America, whether Jew or Gentile, Protestant or Catholic, is entitled to his fundamental rights as a man; and because I believed in that I stood on the streets of Orange and defended a handful of Jews and Catholics who had few friends at that time to defend them and to champion their right to be freemen in a free country. But there have come repeated demands that this person or that person be branded as pro-Fascist or pro-Nazi simply because he expressed intolerant views. I do not hold with those who condemn anyone on account of his race or creed but there is no law against a man's being intolerant as much as we deplore intolerance; there is no law against a man's denouncing the South. God knows I have heard southerners denounced as viciously in certain quarters of this country as I have ever heard Jews denounced. Only a few days ago a Member from Texas read an editorial here which stated that southern boys had joined the Army because of the low standards of living and because they could make more money in the Army than they could at home. That is typical of what I have encountered during the past 4½ years. I have seen people boycott meetings at which I was scheduled to speak because I came from the South. Talk about intolerance. What is intolerance? How can any minority invoke the name of tolerance and Americanism when it itself is guilty of the same intolerance it decries in others. Tolerance in America means that Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant, southerner or northerner, all of us must unite unhesitatingly and without qualification in the support of the Bill of Rights, the chief cornerstone upon which this Republic was established.

Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the RECORD so that this House may know the truth? And I read an excerpt from the report of our committee as evidence of this service to Government agencies. This committee reports to the House:

> As evidence of this service to Government agencies, the committee reports to the House that during the past 14 months, some 1,600 agents from the various intelligence units of the Army, the Navy, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Secret Service, and others have called at the committee's office in Washington alone for information. Hundreds of agents from the same agencies have called at the committee's branch offices in New York, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, and Chicago for similar information.
> In addition to the above, the following agencies have detailed liaison agents to work daily at the committee's offices checking and obtaining information from the committee's files: Civil Service, Intelligence Unit of the Treasury, Military Intelligence, Naval Intelligence, State Department, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Work Projects Administration, Secret Service, and Office for Emergency Management. The branch offices of the committee have been used in a similar manner.
> Numerous requests for information which the committee has received from Government departments have involved the committee's turning over large files of documents. For example, the committee on February 3, 1942, supplied the Office of the Coordinator of Information with 210 documents on Nazi propaganda. Somewhat earlier, the committee turned over to the Department of Justice hundreds of original documents which provided the Department with the basis of its cases against Auhagen, Zapp, and Tonn.
> On August 15, 1942, the committee forwarded to the President a list of approximately 17,000 individuals who had been identified or affiliated with the Nazi movements in this country and suggested at the time to the President that some form of surveillance should be kept over these people.

Mr. Speaker, 3 years before there was any vigorous attempt made against un-American elements our committee had seized and exposed practically all their records and we sent to the President of the United States at one time the names of 17,000 people who were pro-Nazi, names this Government could not have obtained from any other source in the United States except this committee. Last year we received over 138,000 requests from Federal agencies for information which we gave. I say this in justification of the committee's work, because there is a well-organized attempt being made for the purpose of creating the impression that this committee has neglected the Nazi angle and that the committee has devoted all of its attention to the Communist angle. When they say "Fascist" what do they mean by "Fascist"? They mean people who believe in simple, fundamental Americanism, people who believe in preserving our Constitution, people who believe that America shall not fall a victim to the maudlin internationalism which characterizes a few people in this country. They mean people who are opposed to opening wide the gates of this country and permitting immigration to flood into our midst; consequently they have chosen from this House Members of Congress who oppose their views, who oppose their objectives, and with the money of Marshall Field, Cochran, Arthur Goldsmith, and others, they are seeking to play the old Hitler trick of propaganda that if you tell a lie often enough some people come to believe it as the truth. They are seeking by that technique to defame and besmear the honest names and reputations of men in this House who have no other purpose on earth except to protect America and preserve it for their children and their children's children.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I shall wind this speech up, because if I attempted to elaborate upon the many phases of it, it would be an imposition upon your time. Let me, however, as I conclude, Mr. Speaker, say to the House that on account of the importance of many of the matters that I hold here I shall recommend to our committee that a special report be filed for the purpose of documenting the evidence which shows the efforts that were made against Members of this House by these same forces, the lies that were disseminated.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in a fair fight, I believe in standing up face to face and fight, but I do not believe in these blows below the belt; I do not believe in insidious organizations spreading propaganda that is false. I want to know why the Robert Marshall Foundation, which I exposed on this floor on September 24, 1942, is not taxed when they use funds for political activity in this country. Thousands of dollars have been contributed by Gardiner Jackson and the other trustees to other organizations that are busily engaged in an attempt to smear Members of Congress. If that is not political activity, what is political activity? If it is such, why should not this great foundation of wealth be subjected to the tax laws of the United States of America?

Mr. Speaker, because I do not have time to read all these names, I ask unanimous consent to place them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I come now to the question of what Congress can do about it. The people of this country, make no mistake about this, are demanding of the Congress a few simple things. One is that we support in every possible way the war effort, that we devote all our energies, all of our abilities, to the one task of winning this war at the earliest possible date. On the other hand, they are equally insistent that we preserve this Government so that when our boys return they will not find that their sacrifices have been in vain. They are demanding that the Congress assert its independent role as a member of the tripartite government under which we live.

They are demanding that while cooperating in the war effort we act in a constructive and helpful way, not as haters of the administration, not as bitter critics of anyone, but as Members upon whose shoulders there devolves a special responsibility and a special function as sacred as that responsibility that is imposed upon the Chief Executive. This Congress can and will meet that challenge in a helpful and constructive way. It will meet this challenge by demanding that bureaucracy shall be curbed, that authority given to the Executive must be safeguarded by every possible provision and clearly defined and that the heads of bureaucratic government must come before the Congress and account strictly for their acts and their conduct.

We have no right to interfere with the conduct of our international affairs or by speech or by action to embarrass those who are charged primarily with that responsibility. We have a right to assume that those who are directing the international affairs on behalf of this country are jealously guarding our future interests. We have a right to assume as Members of Congress that those who are conducting the war effort are keeping constantly in mind that when this war is over the American people must face the gigantic task of reconstruction with the largest debt ever imposed upon people in the annals of time. We and the people have a right to expect that there be no commitments to any kind of internationalism which involves the destruction or the security of our sovereignty as a free people.

We believe that will be done. We have no right as Members of Congress to embarrass the President or State Department in the conduct of international affairs. But as Members of Congress we do have the right to demand that every dollar we vote from the pockets of the American taxpayers shall be wisely and usefully spent, not in order to achieve some social idea of a crackpot, not for the purpose of trying to build up this theory or that theory of government, not for the purpose of entering into alliances to further strip the States of their authority and jurisdiction under the Constitution; but that this money shall be used as the money of a free people to be devoted to winning this war.

We also have a right to expect that when this war is over we shall have the courage and the determination to occupy Germany, Italy, and Japan with our soldiers and to say to them: "There will not be another war. We will not rely upon your treaties, nor upon your written or spoken word."

We will go into Germany and into Japan and there with our soldiers we will stay until such time as we may be certain that there will never be a recurrence of totalitarian aggression. To that end members of both parties can dedicate themselves without stint. To that end let us all work.

There must be national unity, but it must be a national unity cooperated in as much by the executive branch as by the legislative. There can be no national unity when bureaucrats are linked up with the effort to smear Members of Congress. In the report which I hope our committee will print, I shall give the names of men in the Government who behind the scenes have actively engineered this whole campaign to smear Members of this House who are exercising their God-given and constitutional right.

Bureaucracy, Mr. Speaker? I hold here a folder of evidence so outrageous that I wish I had the time and the occasion was appropriate for me to read you the telegrams. This evidence came quite accidentally to our committee in the course of its investigation of the Union for Democratic Action. We came into possession of many telegrams, bank records, and telephone slips relating to a matter not directly under our jurisdiction.

I am going to turn this entire file over to the Committee on Appropriations. Here are the telegrams and records of Government officials showing that some 10 Government officials were involved in a conspiracy by one business concern to smear and destroy another business concern; telegrams showing that officials of the Government seized the files and the records of an American business concern and turned them over to its competitor so that the contents could be used by the Union For Democratic Action in a campaign of smearing that business concern; evidence showing the extent to which irresponsible bureaucracy will go when men become so partisan in their feelings and in their beliefs, so called upon to usher in the new order by their own efforts, so fanatical in their zeal for the cause which they mistakenly confuse with democracy and liberalism, that they use their office in order to do what common decency and ordinary honesty forbid, to take the files and records of one American taxpaying business concern and deliberately turn them over to its competitor to be used by a filthy agent of lies for the purpose of smearing and blackmailing and besmirching the other business concern and its officers.

While I shall not at this time disclose all these telegrams, for the simple reason that we have no jurisdiction over them and it would immediately be charged that the committee was stepping out of bounds and engaging in something foreign to its authority, I shall turn these telegrams over to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] in the hope and the certainty that he will take the telegrams and bring before him the Government officials concerned and ask them to explain their outrageous conduct. Congress does have a remedy. If we cannot obtain relief from one source, then we as Members can say, "If you do not get rid of these people we will refuse to appropriate money for their salaries."

Mr. Speaker, I tell you that that is what the great majority of the people of this country want. That is what 85 or 90 percent of the Democrats want, and that is what 85 or 90 percent of the Republicans want. If the people want it and it is our duty to do it, then I submit it is now in order that the Committee on Appropriations take immediate and vigorous steps to eliminate these people from public office.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I take this occasion upon the conclusion of last year's work of the committee to express my deep gratitude to the members of that committee for their cooperation? May I express gratitude to the Members of this House on both sides of the aisle for their unswerving loyalty to a committee that has consistently fought the enemies of this country during a period when many people in America were asleep?

Mr. Speaker, if we had been as well informed by our diplomats and our commercial attachés about what our enemies were doing in Germany and Japan as this committee has kept this House and the country informed about what they have been doing in the United States, there would not have been a Pearl Harbor. That is spilt milk, but the future lies ahead, the future in which all of us must break a lance in the defense of constitutional government. We must say to the bureaucrats and the crackpots and the Communists and all of the disciples of totalitarianism, Americanism must live, America shall live.

Mr. ROGERS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of California. Mr. Speaker, we have just had an oration delivered in the more classic vein. I should like it to be known that at least one Member of this House disagrees; that I disagree with the sentiments expressed, the flamboyant manner of expression, and the use of this great public forum as a means of what we in Hollywood would call personal publicity. I disagree.

"HORSESHOES IS HORSESHOES"—PART II

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, in the Saturday, January 23, edition of the Washington Evening Star the information man of the W. P. B. attempts to set me right on my horseshoes. Well, if this information man—his identity is not divulged—does not know anything more about horseshoes than his answer to my remarks would indicate, I do not blame him for using a nom de plume—"information man."

If, however, I knew his identity, I would, in charity, recommend him for membership on the popular radio program, Information Please. Adams and the rest of the Information Please staff would have to strut their stuff to keep up with him. To begin with he states:

> The prose style of the letter led Mr. FLANNAGAN to conclude that its author was E. R. Gay of the War Production Board, vice president of the St. Regis Paper Co., and son of the late Prof. Edward Francis Gay, of Harvard * * * but the spokesman for the Board today said the letter was not written by Mr. Gay, who is chief of the industrial branch, Office of Civilian Supply, but by one of his subordinates, Verne V. Gregg, in charge of farm machinery, a man born on a farm, graduated from Missouri College of Agriculture, one time manager of a 2,700-acre farm and until recently an employee of the Agricultural Department. Yes, said the spokesman, there were horses on the big farm Mr. Gregg managed.

My colleagues, there is nothing prosy about the style of the letter. It was not written in a dull or commonplace manner without regard for its metrical structure. Why, I think it should be set to music. Read it in my remarks that appear in the RECORD on page 397, and I think you will agree with me that the style is distinctly poetic, and clearly shows that the writer is not only endowed with imagination, but possesses the power of rhythmical expression. Far be it from me to accuse a distinguished alumnus of Harvard and the son of the late Prof. Edward Francis Gay of Harvard of having a prose style. Why in my remarks I conceded that he was a master of syntax and rhetoric. And to allay the suspicion of the W. P. B. information man that I was so dense as to consider the style of the letter prosy, I hasten to state that from beginning to end the letter clearly indicates a Harvard accent, rather than the farm flavor one would expect from a renowned graduate of the Missouri College of Agriculture.

But, my colleagues, why speculate on the authorship of the letter? I did not have to resort to either style, or accent, or flavor, to determine its paternity. The author was so proud of his learned treatise on horseshoes that he signed his name in black ink. The letter is signed: "Edward R. Gay, Industrial Program Branch, Office of Civilian Supply."

I am indeed surprised that the information man now informs us that Mr. Verne V. Gregg is attempting to literally steal Mr. Gay's masterpiece. If I were Mr. Gay, I would not permit a subordinate in my office to steal my brain child.

And if I were Mr. Verne V. Gregg and had been born on a farm, graduated from Missouri College of Agriculture, and managed a 2,700-acre farm, I would deny with my dying breath that I ever entertained such thoughts about the lowly horseshoes as are expressed in Mr. Gay's letter. But if, as a matter of fact, Mr. Gregg did compose the horseshoe masterpiece, he played a dirty trick on Mr. Gay in allowing him to daddy it.

Now, just a word as to the management of the 2,700-acre farm. Probably the reason Mr. Gregg lost out as manager and had to seek employment with the Department of Agriculture was because he did not know his horseshoes. "There were horses, you know, on the big farm Mr. Gregg managed," says that information man, and probably Mr. Gregg fell down on the job of keeping them shod.

Continuing, the information man has this to say, and I again quote from the Evening Star:

> What Mr. Gregg meant, it was explained, was that it would be a good thing for farmers to remove the shoes from horses at the end of their annual work period before turning them out to pasture. Otherwise, the horses cast the shoes in the pasture and when they are recovered by little boys they do not go into the scrap drive but are hidden under their pillows or nailed to the barn door.

Well, what Mr. Gay, not Mr. Gregg, said in the letter was this:

> Horse owners can, in many cases, save shoes by removing the shoes immediately after a period of necessary road work or other work where shoes are necessary only during certain periods.

But now, lo and behold, it appears that the necessity for removing the shoes is to keep little boys from picking up the worn-out horseshoes and hiding them under their pillows or nailing them to the barn door, and thus diverting them from the scrap drive. As to nailing them to the barn doors: Horseshoes are supposed to bring good luck, and if, perchance, they do, the good Lord knows that they should be nailed above every barn door in America until we get rid of some of the wonder boys that are trying to run the farm program. As to little boys hiding them under their pillows, let me say that at one time I was a little boy on the farm, and I remained on the farm until I grew into a big boy, but neither as a little boy nor a big boy did I ever put horseshoes under my pillow. When night comes on the farm the little boys, and the big boys, too, are usually tired and worn out and ready for the "hay," and I cannot imagine that any of them would put horseshoes under their pillows to disturb their slumber. While I confess that as a boy on the farm I used to sleep with my dog, when it comes to sleeping with horseshoes I deny the charge, not only for myself but for every farm boy in America. Usually old Morpheus has very little trouble with the country boy. But, my colleagues, would not old Morpheus have a time trying to nurse a country boy who had horseshoes under his pillow back to sleep?

As the information man does not attempt to answer my observations on the elimination of nonessential styles, I presume that what I said about the pointed toes and open toes and the high heels and low heels and the zipper styles stands good. This is indeed comforting, because the zipper style which permits you to zip them off and zip them on solves the whole problem.

In conclusion the information man reaches a new high in horseshoes. Old Dobbin is really going places according to the information man. Listen, and I quote:

What surprised Mr. Gregg, the board spokesman said by way of a return shot, was that a rural Congressman like Mr. FLANNAGAN did not understand this instruction in the letter: "more resets to get more wear out of available shoes." "Resets" do not mean changing the shoes from one foot to another, it was explained, but mean resetting the same shoes on the same foot. Unless the horse is manicured under his shoe periodically the hoof deteriorates (military term) and the shoe is cast while working.

Well, this return shot was a hot one and came nigh unto paralyzing me. Under the new rules of the game, I now observe, we are not only going to give old Dobbin the choice between pointed toes and open toes, high heels and low heels, black and tan, low quarters and high quarters, but we are going to open up beauty salons and give dear old Dobbin a manicure. And I suppose when the winsome lassie gets through manicuring old Dobbin that she will put on some hoof polish, to be selected to match up color, and then direct him to the next chair where he will get a permanent, mane and tail.

Holy smoke, "where," Mr. Information Man, "do we go from here?"

Let me again tell you a story:

Years ago I represented a 6 foot 2 farmer, who weighed around 250 pounds, in a lawsuit. It took a lot of cornbread, hog jowl and cabbage, and other foods rich in muscle building, to keep him going. In the course of the suit we had to make a trip into the cabbage country around Rural Retreat to take depositions. When we boarded the train to return home we found the car rather crowded, and my farmer friend took a seat by a nice looking old gentleman who, from his appearance, it was evident was a stranger to the countryside. I secured a seat immediately behind them. We had only gotten a short distance from the station when we commenced to run through one cabbage field after another, and so naturally the conversation between my farmer friend and his new acquaintance drifted into cabbage.

Said the stranger to my farmer friend:

"Now, the way to cook cabbage is with cream," and he went ahead and told in an appetizing way how his wife creamed cabbage.

I saw that the new cabbage recipe was not registering with my farmer friend. He sat mum and looked bored. No doubt he was thinking about trying to do a hard evening's work on creamed cabbage.

Finally the stranger said:

"Now, my friend, when you get home get your wife to fix you up some creamed cabbage."

And all my farmer friend said, and I could see by the expression on his face that he was disgusted, was:

"A little hog jowl won't hurt them."

And so say I; "a little hog jowl" complex won't hurt some of the bureaus handling the farm problem.

Moral: Give us a few more men in the farm program set-up who know more about cabbage and hog jowl and less about cabbage and cream.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JONES. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] be permitted to address the House for 45 minutes on next Monday at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON] be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, following the special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, at the conclusion of the special orders heretofore entered, I be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a radio address I delivered recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

AIRPLANE ACCIDENTS

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, during the last several weeks there have been a good many rumors going around in reference to the number of airplane accidents in continental United States. Only last week I took cognizance of one of these rumors when I had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from the Honorable Robert A. Lovett, Assistant Secretary of War for Air. If the Members have read that letter, which appears in the RECORD, they will find that insofar as the Air Transport Command is concerned, a marvelous record of efficiency is being maintained in that service. That letter indicates, Mr. Speaker, that for the preceding 6 months' period, of the planes delivered to the Transport Command for flight to the 10 theaters of war throughout the world, only 1 fatal accident occurs out of every 500 planes received for transport. Over the 12 months' period, the Members will see when they have read the letter, that the record of efficiency of the Air Transport Command is so high that during that period, out of every 333 planes which were placed in the hands of the Transport Command for delivery to the 10 fighting fronts of the world, only 1 sustained a fatal accident.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I will be glad to yield when I have finished my statement.

Mr. HINSHAW. I just want to get one point straightened out.

Mr. BROOKS. I should be very glad to answer the gentleman's question later. Mr. Speaker, that should cover record of the Air Transport Command, but it does not cover all figures as to all Army aviation. I read the Nichols committee report, and there are a great many accidents which are covered by that report. The committee report states clearly the reasons for the accidents, and gives its conclusions and findings as to what action should be taken to prevent a recurrence of accidents of the kind investigated. But this report omits reference to the over-all figures as to the accident rate existing in the Army at the present time, in a comparative sense. Accordingly last week I addressed a communication to the Assistant Secretary of War for Air and asked him if it were possible to give me the figures down to date covering all Army air accidents in Continental United States. As a result of this communication, I am in receipt of a letter from Assistant Secretary Robert A. Lovett, which letter is as follows:

JANUARY 28, 1943.

The Honorable OVERTON BROOKS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BROOKS: In reply to your inquiry about accidents involving Army airplanes, I am glad to give you below figures obtained from the Directorate of Flying Safety, Army Air Forces.

The expansion of the Army Air Force activities in the United States in the past year has been enormous and has reached a scale far greater than is realized by even well-informed officials of the Government. In the first 8 months of 1942 (the latest completely tabulated figures available) 74.3 percent more hours were flown than in the whole 10-year period 1930–40; 98.5 percent more miles were flown from January to August 1942 than in the entire 10 years 1930–40.

This 8 months' mileage is equivalent to over 48,000 trips around the world.

In spite of this extraordinary expansion, the rate of accidents per 1,000 hours flown was lower in the 1942 period than the 10-year peacetime average.

Accident rates fluctuate from month to month and from year to year. Hence an average is used to obtain a reliable comparison. For purposes of comparison and to establish a peacetime average against which operations can be fairly measured, the 10 years 1930–40 have been used as a norm. The figures for the first 8 months of 1942 show that the accident rate per 1,000 hours during the period was actually eleven one-hundredths lower than the rate for the 10-year peacetime period from 1930 to 1940. The rate of fatal accidents per 1,000 hours flown is up only fourteen one-thousandths compared with the 10-year average.

The increase in fatalities results primarily from two factors: (a) The great increase in speed and weight of modern combat planes as compared with peacetime planes; and (b) the very great increase in the size of the planes and the number of persons carried as crew. Since a large number of men are frequently involved in a single accident today, the rate of fatality per 1,000 hours has increased five one-hundredths compared with the 10-year peacetime average.

These figures are particularly striking when it is realized that our training schools and operational training units are operating under pressure of war. Furthermore, before sending combat crews into combat theaters located all over the world and in widely varying climates, it is necessary to train them in a variety of weather conditions so that when they meet the enemy in life and death combat they will not have the added hazard of running into flying conditions and weather with which they are not experienced.

The military airplane is a weapon—perhaps the most powerful one in existence. Such planes are very fast, heavily armed, and carry explosives. Nevertheless, in the face of these facts, it is notable that the frequency rate of accidents is still actually lower per hours flown than the average of the peacetime years mentioned above.

It is well to point out at this time that the number of accidents has increased and will increase in some proportion to the tremendous increase in the number of planes flying and the number of hours flown. This is so for the same reason that there are more accidents in a State with 1,000,000 automobiles than in another one with 100,000 automobiles. As time goes on and our air force grows toward its goal of becoming the most powerful one in the world the number of airplane accidents will inevitably grow. However, the important criterion is whether the rate of accidents in relation to the number of hours flown has increased disproportionately.

The Army Air Forces are understandably determined to maintain the fine record which has resulted from unceasing attention to safety measures and control. The directorate of flying safety is continually improving safety techniques in order to keep accidents at the lowest rate consistent with the hazards necessarily involved in the primary task of the Army Air Forces, which is to make our pilots the best combat pilots in the world.

We feel sure that the public is prepared for unavoidable accidents, but they are entitled to know all the facts which can be given short of disclosing information which would be useful to the enemy. Accordingly, as a matter of policy, the Army Air Forces do not withhold from the press news of accidents. In consequence the publicity such occurrences receive has created in the minds of some people the wrong impression that accidents are increasing at an alarming rate and that perhaps proper measures are not being taken to reduce them. The facts given at the outset of this letter prove that the opposite is the truth.

A knowledge of the true facts and of the determined efforts which are constantly made to protect the lives of our men in training and give to them a better fighting chance against an enemy seasoned by years of combat experience should result in continued confidence by the public in the carefully planned and supervised program of the Army Air Forces.

If, as indicated in your inquiry, you intend to make this letter public, I trust that you will agree with me that it is best to have it published in full rather than in part.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Assistant Secretary of War for Air.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BROOKS. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. The important thing to remember from this letter is that the ratio of accidents per 1,000 hours flown is being reduced and the rate of fatal accidents per 1,000 hours flown is up only fourteen one-thousandths as compared with the 10-year average between 1930 and 1940. When we contemplate the fact that 98.5 percent more miles were flown in the 8 months from January 1942 to August 1942 than in the entire 10 years from 1930 to 1940, we can say that this record of efficiency is truly remarkable. Especially is this the case when we find that the mileage flown during this 8 months' period is equivalent to 48,000 trips around the world, or a total of 1,200,000,000 miles.

The Army is training pilots in tremendous numbers and is developing very rapidly the largest and most powerful air force in the entire world. Greater speeds, more powerful engines, larger bombing and transport planes, and the necessity for training under sub-Arctic conditions as well as under typical tropical conditions those who fly the ships—all are conditions which place a greater strain upon the efforts to keep down the rate of accidents and prevent unnecessary crack-ups and casualties. In spite of all of these factors, the letter of the Assistant Secretary for Air presents some facts and figures which should be of intense interest to the families of the men who compose our air force as well as the public at large. It is truly a magnificent wartime record of a great air force.

To those of us who are especially interested in the standing and efficiency of American aviation, I invite your study to the report of the Military Affairs Committee, No. 2515, dated October 2, 1942. This report shows the same trends as early as October 1942 as are shown in the letter of Robert A. Lovett, Assistant Secretary for Air. The report was accompanied by a box score showing the actual number of American planes lost in combat to those lost by the enemies of this country. At that time the ratio of losses in combat with the Japs was from five to seven Jap planes to every American plane lost. The ratio as to the Germans at that time was three Nazi planes lost for every one of our own; and for the entire war on all fronts the ratio at that time was between two and three enemy planes lost to every American plane brought down. It, therefore, appears that we are more than holding our own on every combat front in the world, and that our pilots, mostly trained hastily under wartime conditions, are more than the match in courage, ability, and skill of those of any other nation.

In conclusion, I quote from the last paragraph of the report of the Military Affairs Committee, to which I have already referred:

> There is an old saying, "The proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof." In the final analysis, it is the box score that counts. It is idle to compare the speed, performance, and maneuverability of one plane against another when engaged in war. These in actual combat are academic questions. It is only common sense to say that our planes and our pilots are performing exceptionally well when they are knocking down two or three enemy planes to every one of ours that is lost. Your committee finds that our planes are not inferior to those of Germany and Japan. We also find those in command of our Army Air Forces fully alert to the lessons in combat that are being learned and ready to make such changes as experience dictates. The American people may be justly proud of the record of the Army Air Forces, their achievements, and their will to bring this war to a speedy and successful conclusion.

I yield now to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I was wondering if, in referring to the Air Transport Command, the gentleman was referring to the command which transports troops, or the ferry service, or the Air Service Command, which transports freight, or to the whole thing altogether.

Mr. BROOKS. Of course, the Transport Command is a part of the Air Force.

Mr. HINSHAW. To which part was the gentleman referring?

Mr. BROOKS. I refer to the aviation that the Assistant Secretary of War refers to in his letter of January 27, which the gentleman no doubt read in the RECORD.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is that the Ferry Service that the gentleman is referring to?

Mr. BROOKS. It is more than the Ferry Service. It is also the Transport Command. It transports not only troops, but freight.

Mr. HINSHAW. Then it includes all of these branches?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes; and naturally transports combat planes and transport planes to the fronts all over the world.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT] is recognized for 1 hour.

MEAT RATIONING IN CALIFORNIA

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of my remarks, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am going to speak today to explain as nearly as I can a subject about which many of us have perhaps given very little thought.

Beginning in November 1942 we had some rules and regulations set up by the Office of Price Administration and the Department of Agriculture with regard to our supply of meat. There was a quota placed on animals slaughtered. There was a ceiling price placed on the dressed meat.

In many areas in the State of California people have not had meat on their table for a period of 3 or 4 weeks at a time. In one community of 9,000 people in my congressional district for 4 consecutive weeks there has been no bacon or ham for sale in any of the stores. I am wondering how long we as American citizens can continue to wait while some bureaucrats down in the departments sharpen their pencils, wear them out on paper, trying to figure out some new scheme or theory while somebody back home who is working in agriculture, a defense plant manufacturing airplanes, or working in the shipyards trying to produce material for our armed services goes without food.

Departmental officials have told me and other Members from the State of California that as of January 1, 1943, meat rationing would be in effect. January 1 has come and gone. The month of January has gone. What do we find this morning? A committee from the Department of Agriculture, a committee from the Office of Price Administration, members of the Lease-Lend, and a member of the Quartermaster Corps spent 2 hours in my office, together with three other Members of the California delegation who were named by the dean of our California group, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], to try to work out this problem. They told us this morning it would be April 1 before we could expect any assistance in the State of California in securing meat.

So I have asked for this time to try to give my viewpoint as I see it. If we are going to have a meat shortage in the United States, if we can foresee additional meat needed other than what we hope to have in the year 1943, certainly we should not sit around here as Members of Congress and let somebody in the Departments set up rules and regulations to continue to slaughter female animals which we hope may produce more meat. That has happened in the dairy industry.

Last year, in January, I spoke in the well of this House and again in the fall of 1941, pointing out what would happen to the dairy industry. Not only I, but other Members spoke on that subject. We were ignored and we awakened to find that dairy cattle are now being slaughtered. Now we are going to have rationing of milk and dairy products. So I think this situation is serious. Our farmers could produce amply if only they were left alone long enough without somebody injecting a lot of red tape to strangle the businessman or the farmer who is doing his utmost to produce in large amounts what the civilian population will use, plus what our armed forces will use.

As I told you, I began studying this problem in November. I had meetings in my home State in the month of December with the officials of the Office of Price Administration. Information was set forth at that time and given to the officials of the Office of Price Administration, but they have undoubtedly ignored the solution set up by their own man in the State of California to assist in this program of providing additional meat for that State. Here is his letter of recommendation to his official.

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Fresno, Calif., December 5, 1942.

To Bert M. Green, acting district manager, Fresno district office.

From John J. Gallagher, chief price attorney, Fresno district office.

Subject: Restriction Order No. 1.

On December 4, 1942, at your request, I attended a meeting held in Tulare, Calif., at which meeting were present the secretary of the Retail Grocers' Association of this district; three or four retail meat dealers; Congressman ALFRED ELLIOTT, Congressman for that congressional district; the manager of the Bakersfield Chamber of Commerce; the manager of the Kern County Chamber of Commerce; and representative of the Kern Valley Meat Packing Co.

Kern Valley Meat Packing Co. have their headquarters in Kern County, and have been supplying retail meat dealers throughout the counties of Kern, Kings, and Fresno, approximately 25 percent of their business being in these outside counties.

Kern Valley Meat Packing Co. informed their retail dealers located outside of Kern County that beginning December 7 they would no longer be able to supply them with meat. Most of these retail dealers have depended exclusively on the Kern Valley Meat Packing Co. for their supply, and now would be unable to go to any other meat packing company for their meat since these other meat packing companies have all they can do to supply customers they have been supplying under their quotas.

The reason for Kern Valley Meat Packing Co.'s action is as follows:

Kern County has a population of approximately one hundred and thirty-five to one hundred and forty thousand people. A year ago there were between 8 and 10 meat-packing companies supplying retail meat stores. Among these meat-packing companies were Armour, Cudahy, Swift, Hormel, etc. They shipped their meat in from Los Angeles, and accordingly, when restriction order No. 1 became effective, these outside packing companies stopped supplying meat to Kern County, and, despite the fact that their quotas were determined on people whom they had supplied in Kern County, they no longer make deliveries to Kern County. The result of this is that the Kern Valley Meat Packing Co. is the only slaughterer and supplier of Kern County and vicinity at the present time.

If Kern Valley Meat Packing Co.'s quota is not raised immediately, beginning December 7, 1942, all the retail dealers that have been buying from the Kern Valley Meat Packing Co. outside of Kern County will have no meat at all for their customers.

I believe some method should be set up in which the meat quotas should be determined by territory and population rather than by giving packers quotas when these packers' quotas can move out of a district, take their quotas with them, leaving the people of the district meatless.

This problem is true at the present time in Kern County and vicinity, and we shall have the same problem throughout this whole valley in the immediate future. Unless something is done, the result of the present restriction order will be that packers residing outside of districts and furnishing these districts will take their quotas with them and move to their home districts, with the result that these home districts will have much more than their share of the meat, under the quota system, whereas the territories these packers have left will have practically no meat at all.

Some people ask why should there be a shortage just in the State of California. At the present time that State has had an increase in population estimated all the way from 750,000 to 1,000,000 within the last 9 or 10 months. In addition to that, we have in round figures almost a million armed forces in the State of California, of whom perhaps one-third are released each week end, so that they consume in the restaurants and hotels meat that the Government thought would be used for the civilian population. Certainly we do not want to tell the men in the armed forces when they are away from camp that they cannot purchase a sirloin steak or a juicy hamburger.

I am going to give you some figures to prove my point. The estimate given by the Department of Agriculture in 1943 of the production of meat in the United States was 25,700,000,000 pounds. Lease-lend and the armed forces will receive of that amount 8,500,000,000 pounds, leaving 17,200,000,000 pounds of meat available for the use of our civilian population. On that basis, estimating 125,000,000 people in the civilian population, there would be provided for each and every person, considering the babies who may be eating meat, 2.6 pounds of meat per week. Yet in 1941 the people of the United States consumed 18,900,000,000 pounds of meat. On the quota of our civilian population at that time we had 2.8 pounds of meat per person per week, only two-tenths of a pound difference.

I will agree that a majority of civilians have more money today with which to purchase meat, especially those who are working in the manufacturing plants and who have jobs that they did not have in 1941. But here we are with a rationing program, when we have an estimated amount of meat available for 1943 of 25,700,000,000 pounds of meat against meat actually consumed in the United States in 1941 of 18,900,000,000 pounds.

How does this thing operate? There is a ceiling price placed on slaughtered animals but not on animals on the hoof; so the slaughterhouse man, the packing-house man, in order to operate, has got to get enough to pay his overhead, but the ceiling prevents this. To illustrate how this works out, let us assume that a heifer on the hoof weighs 800 pounds. This heifer will dress out 55 percent of her liveweight, or 440 pounds. The packer pays 13½ cents on hoof for that animal, which is $108; but there is a ceiling on the meat after it is dressed of 23.75 cents a pound, so, after he dresses the animal, he gets only $104.50, immediately losing $3.50 in the operation. Certainly, he has the hide and the tallow, but also he has his operating costs. So the average packer today for every animal he kills, because of various rules and regulations, is losing from $8 to $10. How long can the packer operate under such a program? The man in the feed yards is not doing his utmost to fatten more animals, because he is wondering how long it will be before the packer will have to go out of business because of losses.

Who is responsible? Certainly nobody should be working for our Federal Government who has facts that in some localities people have been without meat from 3 to 5 weeks, yet wants to wait an additional 60 days in order that he may push a pencil around some more blueprints, set up more strangling rules and regulations and red tape, instead of approaching this thing on a businesslike basis.

As a result of what has been done, a black market has grown up. This is not a healthy situation. We are forcing people to be crooks in order that they may operate. No quota or ceiling has been placed on the restaurant or hotel operators. They can buy a steak for 50 cents and charge $1.50 for it, take it or leave it.

No rules or regulations have been set up regarding the cold storage units all over the United States. In many places in the West, not only the State of California but in many other Western States, we have a supply of meat stored away. If it is not used before warm weather sets in perhaps it will spoil because the plants are not equipped to continue to operate and protect the meat in warm weather.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. As I remember it, the gentleman has stated that the total consumption of meat in the United States in 1941 was 19,000,000,000 pounds; is that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Eighteen billion nine hundred million pounds.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is very close to 19,000,000,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman also stated that the civilian consumption in this calendar year has been fixed at 17.2 billions.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. HINSHAW. Since 1941, close to 10,000,000 men have been taken out of the civilian population, and these 10,000,000 men are now assigned a quota under military authority. Is that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is correct.

Mr. HINSHAW. In other words, perhaps 10 percent of the 1941 consumption has been removed from the civilian consumption quota. Is it correct therefore to say that in assigning 17,200,000,000 pounds for civilian consumption today there is no actual reduction in the amount of meat over the normal consumption of 1941?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is true.

Mr. HINSHAW. In other words, can the gentleman assign any reason whatsoever for the rationing of meat today when the meat already assigned for civilian consumption is practically identical with the amount we normally consume without rationing and without restriction in 1941?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The bureaucrats' answer to that is that they want to force into the channels of lend-lease and our Army quartermaster department more meat. More meat for the armed forces and more meat for lend-lease. We are all agreed that the armed forces must come first regardless of what we have to do for our civilian population, but the armed forces and lend-lease can use only 8,500,000,000 pounds in 1943, according to their own figures, so we still have 17,200,000,000 available for the civilian population, which will give them two-tenths of 1 percent of a pound less meat for 1943 than they actually consumed in 1941.

Mr. HINSHAW. In other words, if we were permitted to go ahead and slaughter and consume meat today on a perfectly normal level there would be no shortage whatsoever and consequently no need of rationing, not only in California but elsewhere in the United States.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I think we shall have to go back to practically the old formula, the law of supply and demand and proper distribution. Part of our difficulty and one of the reasons this has bogged down is distribution. They are trying to put these new schemes into effect without making any allowance at all for the problem of proper distribution. No matter how much meat is available for consumption, unless it can be distributed to the point of consumption the program is bound to bog down. For instance, in my valley area we had 10 slaughterhouses serving the territory. When this program went into effect all but 1 of them left.

The quota provides for 70 percent of the slaughter for civilian consumption and 30 percent for the armed forces. That would have been all right had the 10 slaughterhouses continued there, but when 9 moved away they took their quotas with them and the result is we have but 1 slaughterhouse to supply the area that 10 formerly supplied and that 1 slaughterhouse is allowed but 70 percent of its former quota for civilian use.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is perfectly true, but the thing I am getting at here is that if there is no actual shortage of meat allocated to the civilian population what is the purpose in going into a difficult and complicated rationing scheme in order to distribute this meat among the people? In other words, even if there were no rationing of meat at all that in itself would not bring meat to the people if they do not allow the animals to be slaughtered? Is not that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is correct.

Mr. HINSHAW. And under the present schedules that have been set up the animals are not to be slaughtered. Is not that right?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right; the animals are not to be slaughtered, especially not if the packer is to be forced to take a loss on every animal he slaughters at the present time.

Mr. HINSHAW. Of course not. Therefore, the whole scheme from beginning to end is a farce.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. It seems to me that the figures the gentleman has given, and to which the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] referred, are extremely important and should be the basis for our consideration. I do think it is important to remember that the point which was brought out many times in our meetings by representatives of agriculture and O. P. A. was that there was a great deal more buying power throughout the country that has to be taken into consideration. Personally, I would disagree with what seems to be the expression here that rationing would be a mistake. On the contrary, it seems to me that only if we have a program of fair and just rationing will we be able to get meat into those parts of the country that need it the most. Without that I do not know how in the long run we are going to get it. The point the California delegation made, and the committee, as I get it, is that we have not been content to see our State with such short supplies of meat for such a long time while they were getting ready to introduce a program of just rationing. We have taken the position here, and I agree with what the gentleman has said in that respect, that there were some barriers against full production on the one hand and perhaps some false prices that should be removed; and in the second place there should be efforts made so that right now there might be a more equitable distribution into our State of the supplies that are now available. I do believe that we should make our position plain. What we are after is a just distribution of the supplies that are available, so that some sections of the country will not be without meat.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I thank the gentleman. When part of your slaughterhouses and packing houses are not killing their full 70 percent quota owing to the program that has been set up, the other houses cannot afford to deliver it to the areas they did in past on account of the distances from market with such a small amount of meat to deliver, and naturally that makes a shortage of meat in that area.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I agree with the gentleman's point that wherever that exists that quota should be taken up by somebody else immediately and not left lying idle.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The committee has asked the Department to increase the quota where a slaughterhouse might be in that area and where other slaughterhouses have moved out of the area. I agree with the gentleman; and, as was stated by the group, until they are ready to put this rationing program into effect they should permit the slaughterhouses to slaughter their full 100 percent at the present time so nobody will go hungry for meat and this to continue until they are able to put this rationing program into effect.

Mr. HINSHAW. If we have as much meat per capita for the civilian population today as we had in 1941 under free market conditions, what is the purpose of reducing the slaughter to 70 percent? It seems to me there is no excuse for it. It ought to be 100 percent based on the population.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The number of people is the same and the number of pounds of meat is the same, but the people are not eating the same amount that they were eating in the year the gentleman quotes. They are eating a lot less for the moment. The whole population is eating a lot less per capita. It seems to me that the gentleman who is speaking has called attention to the real difficulty in the whole situation and that is that the Department charged with the distribution, if we may call it that, of the meat supply has made these announcements prior to any ability to put rationing into effect and that the same thing has happened here as has happened with sugar, with coffee, and with the other commodities which were rationed. All of the elements involved have not been taken into consideration, and as the gentleman from California said, the difficulty is that we will not get this properly solved until these other elements are taken into consideration and until we get actual rationing and distribution on a proper basis per person. The gentleman who is speaking has recited the fact that certain of these slaughtering houses and packers have ceased delivering in the areas which were entirely dependent upon those packers. I would like to hear the gentleman develop that point a little further.

Mr. ROLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROLPH. I do not know anything about these statistics the gentleman speaks about, but I do know very definitely that my community, San Francisco, is really right up against it for meat. I received this morning copy of a telegram that the Civic League of Improvement Clubs and Associations of San Francisco sent to the President on January 29, setting forth the conditions in San Francisco. With the gentleman's permission I would like to insert this telegram in the RECORD at this point, because it states in a very clear and concise manner the situation in my State. I also want to take this opportunity of complimenting and congratulating the gentleman on his devotion, not only in looking out for the interests of the people of his own district but also the people of California, and I want to say that we are back of him 100 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include the telegram referred to at this point, with the gentleman's permission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROLPH]?

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, January 29, 1943.

To His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT,

Washington, D. C.:

Fully aware of your many and trying difficulties and appreciative of your great leadership we turn to you for succor and relief in a matter of great moment in effort to win the war. Metropolitan San Francisco defense area suffers direly from meat shortage. Daily hundreds are waiting for hours for frugal supplies that are far too fresh for healthful consumption, and thousands of disappointed people are turned away when meager stocks are exhausted. More astonishing is fact of ample slaughter cattle available. Ceiling prices for slaughtering payable and receivable have hamstrung the industry and created black market and havoc. Hundreds of butchers unwillingly forced to leave jobs account shortage of work. Shipbuilders' restaurants are deprived of supplies that could be available. For weeks our citizens are meat hungry and distressed. High Washington officials on recent visits here recognized this deficiency and newspapers daily record promises of relief which is not forthcoming. Can you not with your great power and wisdom so often successfully employed alleviate this unusual intolerable condition. Representative of progressive and greatly expanded San Francisco we earnestly appeal to you.

CIVIC LEAGUE OF IMPROVEMENT CLUBS AND ASSOCIATIONS,
DR. OTTO G. FREYERMUTH,
President.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, May I go further? If we propose to use more meat in 1944, now is the time for us to accept some kind of a program to produce more meat in 1944. For instance, a gilt that was farrowed in the spring of 1942 will have a litter of pigs in the spring of 1943. A gilt that was farrowed in September 1942 will have a litter in the fall of 1943. That same gilt that farrows the spring litter in 1943 will farrow another litter in the fall of 1943.

We can immediately increase the production in hogs more than anything else. Today in the State of California we are slaughtering practically all female animals in beef. Very few steers are being slaughtered. Why? Because of the rules and regulations set up by someone who does not know what he is doing, thus working hardships on the man who is in business. It resolves itself down to one thing after another. There were seven of these men before the California delegation here the other day. I asked them finally, "How many of you men know anything about the meat business or was ever in it before? Those of you who were, hold up your hands." One out of the seven held up his hand. Yet those same gentlemen have set up the rules and regulations which tell us how many we can kill, where we can send it and what we can do, disregarding people who have millions of dollars invested in their own business. I say that until we erase some of those conditions it will still be hard for the men in the cattle business to keep on producing, not knowing what they are going to face.

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. POULSON. How many of those seven men had been in California and knew first-hand of our problems?

Mr. ELLIOTT. None of them.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSS. Has it ever occurred to the gentleman that the quickest way to increase the supply of pork would be to pay premiums for heavier hogs? Today it pays a man better to sell his hog at 180 pounds, although the price could just as well be stepped up to make the 300-pound hog popular. That could apply to beeves, too.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. GROSS. Last Monday on the Lancaster market I sold a load of cattle, well-finished shorthorn steers weighing over 1,200, that brought only $1.50 a hundred more than cows, because of the price ceilings put on meat. The packers chose the common, half-finished stuff. Common steers with just a little bit of flesh brought $14.50, and these well-finished steers of mine brought $14.75.

It is a matter of this thing not being managed right. If there were a premium paid for weight this stuff would quickly go ahead. If all the hogs in the country now coming at 180 were marketed a month or three months later at 250, can the gentleman see what that would mean?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSS. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman said he sold a carload of cattle at 14¾ cents a pound. Does the gentleman believe the packer who bought his cattle at 14¾ cents a pound can stand a ceiling of 24¾ cents a pound on his dressed meat?

Mr. GROSS. He said he could not. That is why he was buying the other steers. Bulls brought more than my steers did. Lean bulls brought more last Monday on the Lancaster market than my well-finished shorthorn steers.

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. OUTLAND. The question has sometimes been raised that perhaps the matter of transportation enters into it; that the problem of transporting both troops and equipment into certain sections like California has helped to cause this situation. According to the testimony the gentleman's own committee has developed, there is a sufficient supply so that if the regulations permitted it there would be not an adequate but certainly a comparable supply for areas like that State.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is true.

Mr. OUTLAND. In other words, the problem of transportation is not causing the shortage in California?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. I live in the State of Texas, which produces more cattle than any other State in the Union, yet we are faced with exactly the same situation you are of being unable to buy beef right in the heart of the cattle country. A large part of it goes to just the same situation that we have, a system of prices set up that makes it impossible for anybody to carry anything along that will produce more meat next year. We are able to get more for cows than we are for steers. We are able to sell calves for more than we can get for well-fed cattle.

I myself sold some calves just a short time ago which I had no intention in the world of selling, but the boy down on the place wrote me saying, "I was offered so much for those calves and could not afford to turn it down." Of course, he could not, because we got as much for those calves in December as we could get for them by carrying them over until next spring.

We now are faced with the same thing I am sure you are faced with. I know it is the rule in Texas that you cannot buy feed for more than 2 weeks in advance. If you are going to put steers in the feed lot, you cannot contract for your feed for more than 2 weeks at a time. As long as I have known anything about the cow business, I have never known anybody who could afford to go to feeding steers without knowing where he was going to get his feed and knowing whether he was going to be able to have feed enough to finish them up. If we stop a lot of these rules and let the cowmen of America go to raising beef, they will raise beef. If you let the hog people of America go to growing hogs, they will put pork on your table, if you will simply give them an opportunity to do it and pay them a price for doing it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. This is what is happening. In the State of California today hay is at $40 a ton. On the 1st of January it was from $28 to $32 a ton. Now it has reached a point where it is $40 a ton. Cottonseed cake jumped from $25 to about $45 a ton. Yet here is a man feeding cattle, and he does not know what minute someone will come along and slap a ceiling on these animals he is proposing to have fat at a certain date. The present program is keeping a lot of cattle from being in the fat yards that are not there at the present time. The remarks of the gentleman are absolutely correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I did not hear all of the gentleman's able speech, but the situation in my district is probably similar to that in Los Angeles and San Francisco. When I left my district it was my understanding that one of the main reasons they issued this regulation of which the gentleman speaks was that our quotas on the Pacific coast, particularly in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle, were based upon the 1940 census.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Of course, anybody who has been out in that area would know that San Francisco, for instance, probably has half a million more people, Seattle 300,000 or 400,000, and God knows how many there are in the Los Angeles area now.

Yet the people making the quotas here, if you tell them that, look at you with blank amazement as if to say, "We set the quotas, and there you are." That is one of the problems.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I have commented on that.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Has anything been done to correct that or are they still looking at us as if we did not know our own districts?

Mr. ELLIOTT. They told me this morning they doubted very much whether we had an increase in population on the west coast, but in the city of Los Angeles itself, there has been an increase of over 300,000, and every week-end there are from 150,000 to 250,000 men in the armed services that visit that city, and they do not eat bread alone while they are there, they eat steaks.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If those officials would go out to the coast cities and try to get a place to sleep some night, they would know how crowded they are.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. WELCH. Is it not a fact that in the conferences held between the California delegation and the representatives of the O. P. A. and the Department of Agriculture, it was admitted that a greater beef shortage exists in California than in any other State?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is correct.

Mr. WELCH. And also that the State of California has increased its population faster than any other State in the Union?

Mr. ELLIOTT. They agreed on that also.

Mr. WELCH. The population of San Francisco alone has increased nearly 100,000 since war was declared, and still they do not see fit to increase our meat quota. Workers performing the hardest kind of labor in the shipyards and other defense plants are going as long as a week at a time without sufficient meat to sustain men performing that kind of labor.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I want to give now some figures that prove my contention of wondering whether or not we should be going into the meat rationing program at all until we have a proper formula. In the 10-year period 1931–40 there was a slaughter average in the United States of animals, cattle, 14,200,000; calves, 9,200,000; sheep and lambs, 21,900,000; hogs, 64,400,000. In 1941 we slaughtered 16,400,000 more cattle, a 2,000,000 increase over the average of the 10-year period; calves, 9,300,000; sheep and lambs, 22,300,000; hogs, 71,400,000. Then take the estimate for 1942 as contained in the last month for which they have made an estimate for that year. There is an estimated slaughter for 1942 of 18,300,000 cattle, an increase of approximately 2,000,000 over the previous year; calves, 9,600,000; sheep and lambs, 26,000,000, an increase of 4,000,000 over the previous year; hogs, a jump from 64,400,000 in the period for the 10 years and then from the 71,400,000 in 1941 to 82,000,000 for the year 1942.

Mr. Speaker, that definitely shows that we are producing more meat all the time, and I repeat again that we should have definite information if it is expected that we will use more meat in 1944 than is being used at the present time. Further, I suggest that we should slow up on the slaughter of heifers in the various slaughterhouses, and we should stop the slaughter of a lot of the veal calves being slaughtered. Let them grow into more meat, and let those heifers produce a calf possibly the next year. We have to put this on some sort of a business basis. No one knows how long this war is going to last, and as for after the close of the war, we should give consideration at this time to the many countries that will need meat, and we should protect the female animals we have in the United States so that they will be available for breeding purposes to be sent abroad, so that those people in those countries may be able to start to produce something in the form of food for themselves, instead of having this country continue on the lend-lease basis. I am for the lend-lease program and I think that we will have to do something about it perhaps after the war is over to help some of those countries, but certainly we cannot go on continuing to slaughter our animals at the present time in the way we have, but we should start in and try to get an abundance of meat produced not only for our own people, but for many other countries that will be in the market for meat after the war is over.

Mr. ELMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. ELMER. I would like to ask if the gentleman knows who was the fellow appointed to put a restriction on how many little pigs the old sow might have out in the barn lot?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No; I could not tell you.

Mr. ELMER. Mordecai Ezekiel.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman spoke about being in favor of lend-lease. I presume we are all in favor of it, because we are in this thing and there is no way to get out of it now. While you California people are complaining, you heard the gentleman from Brooklyn [Mr. O'TOOLE] last week make the same complaint that you are making today. That is, virtually the same complaint, the shortage of meat in Brooklyn and in New York. You are complaining on the other coast about a shortage of meat. How far are you going with lend-lease? There is a limit to the number of heifers, as you suggested a moment ago. How much will you send across and how much will you keep at home? In the olden days we always kept a little seed corn and a little seed wheat. We kept something to start with.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I might say to the gentleman from Michigan that the proposed amount of meat that will be used for the armed forces and lease-lend in 1943 is 8,500,000,000 pounds.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It is all right to use it for the armed forces. People are willing to go without any meat at all if it is for the armed forces, but when you are speaking of giving it to the civilian population in other lands, that is a different question.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Meat going under lease-lend today is not going for the civilian population in other countries. I asked the direct question. Practically all of it is being sent to the men in the fighting lines, to the Russians and to the English on the African front.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The fighting men, you mean?

Mr. ELLIOTT. To the fighting men. I asked the same question you asked of the Department on two different occasions. They assured me that as far as meat was concerned, lease-lend meat was going to the men in uniforms. As long as it is going there, I think it is good judgment for you and I to agree that that is the proper place for it to go, for it will save thousands of our own boys being placed on the fighting line.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No one has any objection to that. Now you were speaking about killing so many heifers. In our country at least, and I am sure in some of the other Northern States, like Wisconsin, a great dairy State, they have to have equipment in their barns. They have to have drinking cups. The water must be warmed and all that. They cannot get drinking cups. They cannot get piping to carry the water. They cannot get wire for the electricity. Until we can get those things those heifers are not going to do anything. They cannot. How are you going to help that?

Mr. ELLIOTT. As I said, some of this red tape must be erased in order to take care of many of these various things we are discussing, to correct them to the point where we can produce more, no matter whether it is beef cattle or hogs or other commodities.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am not so critical of some of these people who are administering the program as some others, because I realize we are asking for three or four times what they have. There is something to be said along that line. But my point is that unless you keep the foundation here at home so that we can produce this stuff, it would not do any good to talk about sending it over there.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. POULSON].

Mr. POULSON. Is it not true, in line with the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] concerning the fact that cows are selling at a better price than steers, that this condition exists in Los Angeles County? Los Angeles County is considered one of the largest dairy counties in the United States. Even the distinguished professor from Wisconsin will admit that. They are discouraging the dairy industry there; in fact, encouraging the sale of dairy cows by having a lower ceiling price on fluid milk than in San Diego and in San Francisco. As a result the latest figures show that they are only milking the cows for 10 months, and then selling them on the butcher block. Of course, this not only discourages the dairy industry, but in the long run it will be very disastrous, because it is recognized that a cow is not at her height of production until she is 4 years old. I think that is another one of the short-sighted things that has been brought out in this O. P. A. program.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I thank the gentleman. I might add that in 1942 in Los Angeles County you had 88,000 dairy cows, and you had an average kill of 5,000 head a month. In the county of Los Angeles that is what you killed. Those were top dairy cows that were brought in out of the valley. After they had reached the point of production it would not pay the farmer to feed the high-priced feeds they were compelled to feed, and those animals were slaughtered.

To bring out my point that we are still increasing livestock, the figures show that in 1941 in the United States we had all cattle, 71,461,000 head. Of that amount beef cattle amounted to 45,983,000.

Stock sheep, 54,283,000. We had stock hogs, 54,256,000.

In 1942, of all cattle in the United States, we had 74,607,000. Beef cattle, 48,304,000, or an increase of 3,000,000 over 1941. Hogs jumped from 54,000,000 to 60,000,000.

On January 1, 1943, we had over 76,000,000 head of cattle in the United States. Sheep dropped from 55,000,000 to 53,000,000. Why? The reason that sheep dropped was because the sheep herders were taken away from their herds and in order to comply with that issue, they were forced to sell a part of their flocks. So we have a loss of 2,000,000 sheep in the United States in the fall of 1942, owing to the fact of taking away the men who herd the sheep.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Would the gentleman agree that in all of these programs, price ceilings and everything else, there are two factors that the people in charge of them have to be required to take account of? On the one hand is to prevent the cost of living from spiraling, but on the other hand to make certain that it is possible for the producers to maintain maximum production of those commodities. Upon that almost everything depends. So would not the gentleman agree that every price ceiling regulation, all of the matters that will affect the manpower of agriculture and everything else, should be reviewed by somebody who knows something about that production angle?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. It might be well to recall that when the Executive message was sent to Congress on September 7, with reference to price ceilings on agricultural products, it set forth four objectives, and it placed as the first objective controlled prices, and as a second objective, or secondary thereto, ample agricultural production. It has never been the policy of the Price Control Administration to use their powers and prerogatives to increase the production of food; it has not even been their foremost objective to feed the people.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is correct.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. In view of the fact that O. P. A. has changed hands does the gentleman have any reason to believe that Mr. Brown can do any better than Henderson, whose administration we did not like, unless Brown or we get rid of some of Henderson's understudies?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I am not in position to say at this time; but I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that if I were in charge of this program, I would do something different. They have operated this program or proposed to operate it in one form or another for the last 60 days. We have pointed out to them how serious the situation is on the west coast, that in some areas meat is not available for men working in shipbuilding plants and airplane manufacturing plants to the point that there may well be strikes on account of improper food. Notwithstanding that they tell us they can do nothing until after April 1. In other words, we have got to wait 4 months until they can work out a formula. If I were in charge of such an organization and 2 months had gone by without their being able to work out any kind of program but asking still another 2 months, I would begin firing people and employing others who could do something about the situation.

Twenty-three members of the California delegation, entirely unanimous as to the situation, 100 percent in accord on the situation, have told them as a delegation that the condition is very serious and that we expect them to do something about it whereby these workers can have some kind of meat made available for their tables whether it be 2 pounds, 2½ pounds, or some other quantity, but to date nothing has been done. It is a serious proposition.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT] has made a very careful study of this situation. I ask him if it is not a fact that there is no shortage of animals in California available for slaughter at the present time.

Mr. ELLIOTT. A representative of the packing industry came here and made the statement that animals were available for slaughter. Then it was brought to my attention that California did not produce more than the meat it consumed. I have here among my papers a table that shows 1,545,000 head of cattle slaughtered in California in 1941; we imported only 362,000. That is very different from saying that 50 percent of the cattle slaughtered in California were shipped in. The truth of the matter is that the percentage is much smaller.

Mr. HINSHAW. Do they not ship in cattle from Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, Texas, and even from as far as Kansas City?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; but after the animals are slaughtered, the processed meat is then shipped back into those States, Arizona particularly, to provide meat for those people.

Mr. HINSHAW. But there is no reason for the statement that there is a shortage of cattle at the present time, is there?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Many things are involved in answering that question. I personally believe there are plenty of cattle available. I feel that distribution is the main consideration, proper distribution, to see that everybody gets his just share; but what has this program done? It has brought about the black market. They are killing cattle, hogs, everything, any place they want to, practically. The people in the restaurant business and the hotel business can afford to pay twice as much as ordinary civilians can for it. He buys it, puts it on his menu, and charges just what he wants to. No ceiling has been placed upon him. The result is that the little fellow is being robbed right in the very start of the program. I cannot see what this thing is designed for, unless it is to put out of business practically every little slaughterhouse or packing house. I sometimes wonder if that is not what they are trying to do at the present time; drive the little fellow out of every business in the Nation. It is beginning to show up now in the packing industry.

Mr. OUTLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. OUTLAND. In accordance with what the gentleman has just said, the evidence seems to be that there is either in California or nearby States a supply which would guarantee to the people there an amount at least comparable to what people in other States have, would the gentleman say that the situation could be partially solved by two steps:

First, increasing the percentage, the quota allowed for slaughter in California by some designated percentage, 10 or 15 percent out of the total amount made available; and, secondly, by limiting the proportion that could go to restaurants and hotels, thereby increasing the proportion to the individual buyer? Would these two steps be of value in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. ELLIOTT. They would be helpful; but remember that of the slaughter 70 percent is allocated for civilians, 30 percent goes to lend-lease and the armed services. All the slaughterhouse gets out of the animal is the ceiling price of 23.75 cents per pound allowed by the O. P. A., and which operation results in a loss. So he is in the position that when the lend-lease and the Army come along and want their 8,500,000,000 pounds of meat, the price is reduced 75 cents per 100 pounds, as those agencies buy in carload lots. Yet he has already lost $10 a head on every animal. Little by little the small packers are going out of business. He is not killing his 70-percent quota. I have a telegram here before me showing that in California 25 percent in some instances of the 70-percent slaughter is not being slaughtered at the present time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the gentleman has commented on this particular point, but I would like to hear him discuss it just a little further. I have in mind some of these small independent packers. There are two in the agricultural district that I represent which, of course, is not primarily a livestock area. Its principal interest in the past has been cotton and other crops, but in the last several years these little independent packers have come in there and have encouraged the people to grow livestock which they in turn bought from them.

In the last couple of years, where plants have come into that area, there has been a considerable increase in population. I have in mind, however, the area of one of them where I dare say the population has increased 25 to 30 percent, yet the amount of slaughter that that independent house can indulge in is cut down to this percentage which is set by the O. P. A. I have had the matter up with them and tried to get them to give an increase which would take care of the increased population, but they say, "No; we will let the slaughterhouses away from there ship in." Now, your independent house cannot buy the animals that have been grown right in that area, so the farmer is required to ship his stuff 150 or 200 miles away, have it killed, then that packing house ships back the meat.

Mr. ELLIOTT. By rail or on tires?

Mr. SPARKMAN. What difference does it make?

Mr. ELLIOTT. We are saving rubber, are we not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Any way they can get it there. The inevitable result will be that that farmer is going to quit growing that stuff because he cannot ship it to market and make anything out of it. In addition to that, this is at a time when transportation facilities, regardless of whether it is by truck or train, are in great demand, and there is a great shortage. The O. P. A. forces that condition upon us, and I think it is wholly unreasonable. Another result is going to be that the big packer is going to be made bigger and the little packer is going to be wiped out of business.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I want to state an instance to the gentleman from Alabama. In my congressional district we at one time had eight or nine bakeries operating in the valley. The O. P. A. set up their rules and regulations on the amount of sugar a bakery could have, and because those bakeries were not in a defense area they could only produce so much in the way of pastry and bread per day. But in Los Angeles the bakeries down there are in a defense area, and they can get all the sugar they want. So up over the mountain and around the hills come bakery wagons every day delivering bread into this valley in which the bakeries are shut down.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Perhaps the gentleman stated this or I perhaps misunderstood him. What was the element of time involved that the gentleman stated to the House relative to the possibility of the readjustment of the present condition that exists in California as it pertains to the meat problem?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will go back to that. The first time I talked to the Department they told me and every other Congressman it would be about January 1. We met again, I think, about the second week in January; that is, the California delegation, and we had before us seven members of the various agencies. They told us that the following Monday they would come back with some kind of a solution. On the following Monday they did come back but no solution. They agreed at that time that in a few days perhaps something would be worked out without fail. I was told last week that on Monday of this week they would be in my office and to have my committee there, that they thought they had something worked out that would be helpful. They told us this morning that it would be April 1 perhaps before they could give us any relief. In the meantime, going back to December, I asked early in December that an invitation be sent out to the packers and slaughterhouse men to come to Washington, sit down around the table and try to work out a solution that would give relief not only in our State but in many other States that are beginning to have trouble.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does not the gentleman feel that he cannot expect any responsive reaction from that specific department under 8 months?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is the way it begins to look.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I represent a district that has some packers in it. Before I came up here, I talked to some of them about the seriousness of the situation and their inability to supply the local demand for meat. I apprehend that that is what is taking place in California and other sections of the country.

Some of these gentlemen told me that a low limit has been placed on the slaughter. In other words, a packer who slaughters from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 pounds will be restricted to a certain percentage of his previous slaughter. It seems to me if they would list the number of pounds a packer could put up before they put a quota on him that would enable these men to take care of the local situation and supply the meat to the people of many sections where they are not now getting meat.

The truth of the matter is that the large packers are getting Government orders and they are catering to that alone and not giving as much concern to the local communities as they should. If something is not done to help these small packers, as the gentleman says, they are going out of business and the local people are not going to have any source of meat supply.

Mr. ELLIOTT. One of the reasons is that even our armed forces cannot get meat at the present time. The Quartermaster General sat in my office this morning with representatives of various other Government agencies and made the statement that he is way behind in his Government purchases of meat for the armed forces. Why? There is a ceiling placed on meat of 23¾ cents a pound, yet the price of the live animal continues to rise. The packer is losing money. Today the animal hanging on the hook costs the average packer 26 cents a pound. The people in the O. P. A. say, "If it costs him 26 cents a pound, how can he operate?" The reason he can operate is that he has a large investment and he is hoping some formula will be worked out to remedy the situation, so he is taking a loss every day on each animal he kills, because if he stops his operations the men in his plant will get jobs in manufacturing plants some place producing airplanes or tanks or munitions, and when he comes to open up again he will have no men in his slaughterhouse. This situation is daily growing more serious.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does not the gentleman believe that unless something is done to help the small packers we are going to have a really serious shortage of meats?

Mr. ELLIOTT. You have to help both the small ones and the large ones.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The large packers think that they can supply the Army. They have proper inspection and they meet the requirements. The Army will buy from some of the large packers when it will not buy from the small packers.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is true, but the Army and lend-lease together use only 8,500,000,000 pounds of meat a year. That is the estimate for 1943.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. There is no doubt what the gentleman says is true about the price they have to pay for the meat and what they can get for the finished product.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I have here a statement from Mr. Claude L. Safstrom, who is in the packing-house business in Los Angeles, which I should like to read:

1. SEVENTY-FIVE CENT REDUCTION ALLOWED ARMY

The meat packers desire that this reduction be eliminated for the reason that cattle costs so much more than the ceiling price on Grade A cattle in California that to allow this 75-cent reduction means an absolute net loss to the packer. In areas where the meat shortage is so acute there is no reason for the packer to be forced to allow any discount at the present time because the buyers are willing to go to the various plants for the purpose of picking up their meat purchases and pay cash for them at the top ceiling prices.

2. FIFTY-CENT DISCOUNT TO WHOLESALERS

The Vernon packers have been supplying these various wholesalers who operate refrigerator trucks through the outlying suburban sections of southern California where the big packer's truck did not previously make deliveries. These hundred or more wholesalers have been supplying approximately 1,500 little individual retail and grocery markets in metropolitan Los Angeles for years. Therefore, the 50-cent reduction which the Office of Price Administration forces the packers to give these wholesalers is working a great injustice at the present time. It has already caused practically all of the small individual markets to be completely out of stocks of meat for the past 6 weeks.

3. MEAT SHORTAGE IN CALIFORNIA

The meat shortage in California has been so acute that it has fostered the development of two kinds of bootleggers in the meat industry: One, the jobber who purchases live cattle in the stockyards at an exorbitant price and has them slaughtered by some local packer through the payment of an advance premium and then the dressed cattle are taken to his jobbing house, or retail markets, where he has to pierce his own ceilings to a great extent in order to obtain a return on his investment. Two, the operator who has a few retail stores and who bribes the cooler salesman in amounts ranging all the way from 5 to 10 cents a pound to secure a carcass of beef. These are concrete and substantiated facts, not mere hearsay.

4. THE LIVESTOCK PROBLEM

Wholesale cattle prices have risen to such a great extent that the present dress ceiling does not approach the cost to the packers of producing dressed animals for the Army or civilian trade. At the present time the packers are suffering considerable losses on their operations and the outlook is for a continuation of these losses unless the bootleg operators are stamped out of business. The most effective way that they can be stamped out, in the view of the packers, would be through the lifting of the quotas on meats throughout the United States for approximately 1 week or even 2 weeks and the subsequent application of general meat rationing. The packers believe this would solve the bootleg problem very quickly.

May I say to the gentleman from Missouri that earlier in my remarks I pointed out that although there was a ceiling of 23¾ cents a pound on dressed meat, 75 cents a hundred is taken off the price of the meat the Army and lend-lease purchase. So the small packer, although he is losing money, in view of the fact that he has to take off this 75 cents is not very happy about furnishing meat for the armed forces during the present meat shortage and limitation of slaughter to 70 percent, when he has a market for his meat and can get the full 23¾ cents a pound for it. That is one of the things that is happening today that should be corrected immediately. You can talk to the Quartermaster Corps and they will say that they are short millions of pounds of meat they should have at the present time, due to the fact that it is not available. The small packer is losing money and does not want to go further into the hole $15 on every ton of meat he actually handles, and that is what he loses selling to the armed services and lend-lease.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. It seems to me somebody down at the O. P. A. ought to get busy and do something to relieve the civilian population of our country. If that is not done, we are going to be confronted with a very, very serious situation.

I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a telegram which pertains to meat deliveries to our armed forces:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., January 31, 1943.
CLAUDE SAFSTROM,
Care Mayflower Hotel,
Washington, D. C.:

Have delivered 400,000 pounds of meat to Army in January. Have 150,000 pounds to deliver first 10 days February. Losing average $10 head. Cannot assume future contract obligations under present market conditions. Also have cut down civilian quota. Cannot compete with black-market bidders. Last month's results disastrous.

QUALITY MEAT PACKING CO.,
HYMAN ROSEN.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. COSTELLO. I understand that in spite of the conferences that the delegation has had with the Office of Price Administration, and the late conference even this morning, the result is that they have no program and do not now intend to take any particular action.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is correct.

Mr. COSTELLO. And all that we have to do is to wait until rationing begins sometime later in the year, in April.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. COSTELLO. In other words, between now and April the people of that part of the country must suffer for want of food, and the armed forces of the country will not be able to get enough food, adequate for the Army. It seems to me that is rather a pitiable condition, that after a full month's deliberation we have not made any progress with these officials, and that they are still unwilling to take any course whatever to alleviate the situation. It seems to me rather ridiculous.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will say in closing that I believe that the time has come when Congress should act and not sit around here and do nothing, when we have a serious condition affecting one or two States at the present time, and that we should move in force and correct the situation. We should not go along here and continue to wait for a bunch of boys down there who are pushing pencils around a table, who seem to know all of the answers to everything and who at the same time do not want to do anything to correct the situation. We have suggested many remedies and we certainly should get a release of the quotas at the present time and give the people plenty of meat until their rationing program goes into effect. When they refuse to do that, they are refusing the American people proper cooperation.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. BUFFETT. The California delegation, as I understand it, spoke of having lower rates on dressed beef. I come from a large stock-producing area, and those people out there try to find ways and means of shipping more meat to California and they find that an unfair situation results from much higher rates on dressed beef, as opposed to beef on the hoof. And, of course, they are interested in the shipping of the most meat with the least cost of transportation.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman is from Nebraska?

Mr. BUFFETT. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Last week cattle was shipped on the hoof from Nebraska to California.

Mr. BUFFETT. That the gentleman will agree is a poor method of shipping beef to get the maximum amount of meat for the minimum amount of transportation.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes. An Army officer said that they would purchase beef in Kansas City and Chicago and Omaha if available, but at the present time beef there is not available, because the packing-house men do not want to sell at a reduction of 75 cents a hundred they have to take. That is one of the difficulties at the present time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert certain letters and telegrams that I referred to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order heretofore made, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] for 10 minutes.

THE MEAT SHORTAGE

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, the people of America have long taken pride in our ability to produce. We have especially emphasized the productive capacity of our mills, our mines, and our factories. We have awarded the Army and Navy E to plants all over this broad land. Industry has spent millions of dollars for newspaper advertisements, patting itself on the back over its productive achievements. Organized labor has crowded the largest hotel lobbies and convention halls of America with meetings to proclaim the outstanding contribution of its members in bringing about this great industrial production. High officers of the Army and Navy, from Cabinet Members down, have given public recognition at ship launchings, plant openings, and on regular holidays to the debt that our country owed to industry and labor. I find no fault with this deserved recognition of a job well done. It is, however, most unfortunate that there has been no corresponding public recognition of the vital contribution that has been made to our war effort by the third of our population who till the soil. On the contrary, the Army, the Navy, big business, and big labor organizations have all assumed that the farmer, himself, like the farmer's mule, could be expected to toil from sun to sun without recognition and with most meager reward.

Mr. Speaker, I was reared far out in the country, 30 miles from the nearest railroad. I have been closely associated with agriculture all my life. I represent one of the great farm districts of the Nation. I think I can fairly say that I know that the farmer will, to the absolute limit of his ability, contribute to the needs of his Nation, but even as the mule must look to the farmer he serves for adequate food and shelter if he is to be able to pull the plow, so must the farmer look to the Nation he serves for adequate economic sustenance if he is to perform the vital task assigned him. This Nation has not given the producers of food, fiber, and feed the economic sustenance that they must have if they are to meet our war needs. We have recognized the importance of giving every other class in this Nation adequate financial return for the work they do, but we still seem to assume that the ordinary laws of economics do not apply to farmers, or else we are dangerously deceiving ourselves as to the farmer's true condition.

Some years ago we decided that the men working in the coal mines of America were not receiving an adequate wage. About the same time it was recognized that those who worked on the railroads must receive a higher wage to enable them to maintain a proper standard of living. Having decided that the wages of those groups should in justice be raised, we followed our decision to its logical conclusion. We recognized that neither the coal-mine operators nor the railroads could pay the higher wages unless we increased the income of the mine operators and the income of the railroads. We therefore established the Bituminous Coal Commission for the avowed purpose of raising the price of coal, to enable the mine operators to pay the miners a higher wage. The Interstate Commerce Commission deliberately raised railroad freight rates all over this Nation to enable the railroads to pay higher wages. Thus the people who buy coal and the things that are made through the use of coal paid the increased wages of the miners. The people who ship goods by rail and the people who buy those goods—and that is everybody, including the farmer—paid and are still paying the increased wages granted to the railroad workers.

After all, that is the only logical way in which those raises of wages could be given. But at the very time that we allowed those raises the agricultural workers of America were working for a wage far lower than any man in any mine or on any railroad received; they were in fact the lowest paid group of workers in all this broad land—then and now. They were neither organized nor skilled. At that time there was no particular demand for their labor anywhere, and the result was that agricultural labor received no consideration whatever. Today this labor on the farms of this country is in demand. There is competition. Our great war industries want this labor. They are beginning to offer a higher wage for the so-called unskilled labor from the farms. These laborers are often highly skilled in the production of food, but they are leaving the farms today, leaving the farms to go into industry, to go into the factories, to go into the mills; doing the same thing that you and I would do if we were in the place of that fellow who is trying to make a living for his wife and six children, struggling along on some farm. You and I would do the same thing, but it is the very thing which the Nation cannot afford to see done.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I have just received a telegram from my district saying that the employment office of the Government was, down in that great agricultural section where farming operations are just getting under way and where we are going to need all of the manpower possible to produce what the rich soil down in that alluvial valley will produce, recruiting men and taking them to San Francisco, Calif., or to Oakland, to work in a shipbuilding plant out there, at a higher wage than our farmers can pay down there. That is the inducement they are offering—higher wages and ideal housing conditions, and they are recruiting hundreds of farm laborers from that section. We are going to be left down there to try to produce an all-out crop to meet this war emergency, and our manpower depleted, taken to another section of the country. I wonder if the gentleman can suggest what can be done to stop a foolish practice like that?

Mr. POAGE. I can only suggest that in the first place it is but another evidence of the stupidity of the bureaus and commissions, that has been so well discussed on this floor during the preceding hour. It is but another evidence of the unwillingness of some of those who hold high positions in this Government to recognize that agriculture is the most vital industry in this Nation today. You cannot stop the submarine menace by making the American crews that man the cargo vessels go hungry. Nor is there going to be much need to stop the submarine menace if you do not have any food to send in the ship that those submarines are trying to sink.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. Surely, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I notice in the noon edition of one of the Washington papers the following:

> Expected demands by 450,000 bituminous coal miners for a one dollar-a-day wage increase without regard for the War Labor Board's Little Steel formula.

Would the gentleman explain to me how the administration—and you will probably be branded and so will I as a labor baiter—but will you explain how the administration is going to continue to raise the wages of coal miners and all of the other workers in industrial plants, and keep the farms operating and still get food?

Mr. POAGE. No. I will not explain it to the gentleman because I know, as the gentleman knows, that it cannot be done. There is no administration that can pull those sleight-of-hand stunts and still feed the Nation. Of course, this country has had enough to eat in recent years because there was not any opportunity for that fellow out on the farm except simply to stay there with his mule and plow from daylight to dark.

But when he has the opportunity to go, as the gentleman from Missouri has so well pointed out, not only the opportunity but has an invitation extended to him by his Government to go, and work under ideal labor conditions in sunny California, of which we have so recently heard, and draw what seems to him to be fabulous wages—more in 1 week's time than he has made sometimes in a full year—of course that man who has been growing the food for this Nation is going to accept the position. Millions of them have already gone and the tragedy of it is that we apparently never awoke to it until the horse was stolen and those whose labor is necessary to make next year's crops have already left the fields and have gone to the shipyards and airplane factories and munition plants.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. POAGE. Surely.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Last week came a letter from a farmer in one of the agricultural counties in my district in which he asked me this question. He said:

> My neighbors are going down to Benton Harbor and St. Joe—

That is less than 20 miles away—

> to work in the factories and the shipyards there. What do you think I should do for my own best interest, stay with my wife on the farm, go out in the snows and tend the cows and the chickens, or go with my neighbors to take a job in the factory? What would you do if you were in my place?

What is the answer to that letter?

Mr. POAGE. The answer is the same as the answer I have to make to my own people.

Mr. HOFFMAN. There are thousands of them doing the same thing.

Mr. POAGE. And doing it all over the land.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then how are you going to feed the Army?

Mr. POAGE. The answer is evident, that we are not going to feed either the Army or the civilian population unless we change our ways. Those who seem to think we can secure increased farm production have ignored the most serious problem this country is facing; nor can it properly be answered by saying as so many would like to say that we will simply "freeze" the labor on the farm. I cannot believe that any Member of this House with elemental justice in his soul would advocate compelling some man to stay on a dairy farm up in the district of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY], getting up at 3 o'clock these cold mornings, going out, doing the milking, and staying out till long after dark for a wage amounting to only a small fraction of what he might secure working in some well-heated pleasant factory for 8 hours a day. No, we have no right to say to the farm boys that they must put up with all those inconveniences, that they must accept a lower standard of living than their brothers in the city; this Congress has no right to say it. We owe it to those boys to say to them that we will treat them the same as we treat the others who toil for the Nation in our factories, in our mines, and in our mills.

We should pay the man on the farm a fair wage. I know there are those of you who are going to say: "But, Mr. POAGE, I want him to be paid a fair wage." That is all right, but, after all, the farmer who employs him must pay him his wages, and, of course, as a practical matter every worker on the farm must be paid, directly or indirectly, out of the products of the farm on which he toils. In many cases however the farmer for whom the laborer works is hardly making a living himself and simply cannot pay a higher wage no matter how just the worker's demands may be or how willing the farmer may be to increase his wages. If the farmer does not have the income he can no more increase the wages of that farm laborer than could the railroads of this country raise railroad wages without an increase in their freight rates.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. In connection with the subject the gentleman has been discussing, while we received the news that the Federal Employment Agency is down in our section recruiting some of our farm labor and taking it out to California to work in the shipyards, we are advised from a responsible source that the Farm Security Administration, an agency of the Department of Agriculture, is down there now inaugurating a plan to move people from the submarginal sections at the expense of the Government back into that section to supply farm labor. In other words, one agency of the Government is moving the people out while another agency is moving them in from other sections of the country temporarily to do this work. What does the gentleman think about a program like that?

Mr. POAGE. I think it is exactly like the story of the grand old Duke of York, who had 10,000 men. He marched them up a very steep hill and then he marched them down again. I think that is exactly what our Government is trying to do. The quicker we get to marching on level land in a straight direction the quicker we shall reach our destination. I think that at the present time there is altogether too much disposition to overlook the fact that all agricultural wages must come out of the sale price of products of the farm; that regardless of whether the worker is a day laborer, a sharecropper, a tenant, or the landlord, his wage must be paid from the price that the products of that farm bring in the market and that economically there is no other way whereby wages can be paid.

Therefore, we must recognize that all wages, including the wages of the farm operator and his family, must be included in the price of the farm product. That is a thing that so many would like to overlook or pass over lightly without consideration. We should recognize that the wages of the farm operator and his family must, if we are to have an honest calculation of prices, be included in the price of the farm products.

At this time we do not include any wages. We seem to assume that the farmer can do what no other producer has ever been able to do, that is to ignore the cost of production. To correct this situation your Committee on Agriculture has just reported a bill, which I trust will be before the House in the next few days, providing for the inclusion of all wages, the wages of the operator, the wages of all who toil on the farm, in the calculation of parity prices for the product sold from that farm. This bill should be passed without a moment's delay.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, unless we abandon our entire economic philosophy, which I have understood was based upon the theory of private property and actuated by the profit motive, then we must recognize that fundamental justice requires us to include in any fair estimate of a price level for farm products the wages payable to those who toil to produce the goods. If we are unwilling to accept—and for my part I am unwilling to accept—the communistic doctrine that we should not look to private property or profit, then we must grant our farmers this consideration or we must face a most serious food shortage. As a matter of fact, I think that we all recognize that we have already waited too long—that no matter what we do at this late date we are going to be faced with a serious shortage of certain items of food. The hour is late, but it is never too late to do justice, and we can prevent an even more serious shortage during the coming years if we act now.

When the American people recognized that they had to produce ships, that they had to produce guns, bombs, and airplanes, what did they do? Acting through the War Department and other agencies of Government, they took steps to make the production of these items attractive to both industry and to labor. We applied the fundamentals of the profit system. It may well be charged that there was very little democracy in the way this was handled, because, as I understand it, the negotiations were carried on with only the big corporations and the big labor groups. But there was a sound application of the profit system, and it got results.

Just as an illustration, let me take an illustration from my own district. We have a shell-loading plant. What happened? The Government went to the National Gypsum Co., which was simply a large manufacturer. It had never manufactured shells. The Government said, "Mr. Gypsum Company, how about making shells for us?" The company said, "Why, we have never made shells; we are not in that business and we do not know anything about that." "Oh, that is all right. The Government will teach you how to make shells."

The company said, "We have not any plant in which to make shells. Our plants were established for an entirely different purpose and we do not want to convert or rebuild them."

"That is all right. The Government will build you a plant and the Government will pay for it."

"But we don't want to buy a shell plant. We would not want it after the war is over."

The Government answered, "The Government will never make you pay for it, and if you want it after the war you can have it at salvage prices."

Still the company demurred: "But we do not know what it would cost us to make shells. We do not know how we can make an intelligent bid."

Said the Government, "That does not make any difference. We will give you a contract and guarantee you a profit regardless of what it costs you. Do not let that bother you."

Well, the company might have one more objection. "We do not know about the labor question. Can we get the labor?"

"Oh, you can pay any price that is necessary to get the labor and the Government will let that be included in your cost."

With that kind of proposition, those people could not turn it down. Neither could you nor I or any other businessman. So they took the contract. The same thing has happened all over this country. You could not expect industry to reject that sort of proposition.

When they went to get labor they faced the proposition that the Government had already been competing in the labor market to build camps and other structures around over the country. How was the company to handle the situation? Pay enough to get it. Make a contract with one of the big labor organizations to get their members to pay them wages that will be attractive, no matter how high the going scale is. That was done. Why should industry bother? The Government was going to pay the bill. Why should the labor organizations bother about it? Some of those men did not know a saw from a hydraulic jack, but they all paid their initiation dues into the union, the Government paid the wages, the corporation got its profit, and shells were made.

We are getting industrial production, through a rather expensive method, a rather undemocratic method, but nonetheless an effective method and we are getting results. We are paying the bills, but we are getting industrial production. I do not mean to be critical of what happened in the way of industrial production because we are getting production and that is the big thing.

What happened then? After big business got all the contracts it wanted, after big labor got all the work it needed to supply employment at good wages to all of its members, then big business and big labor got together and said, "Now, then, we want to freeze the situation right where it is. We want to freeze prices."

Whose prices? Not the prices big business gets. Those prices are fixed by Government contracts that take care of all cost factors. Not the prices big labor got. They had contracts taking care of their people. They had Government boards to allow increases. They had exemption in the law. Whose prices were they going to freeze? Why, the farmer's prices, the man who is producing the food and the raiment, and the wages of the man who works for him, and the prices of little businessmen all over the country. That is who they froze. That is who has been affected by your ceiling prices.

If you want to get production on your farms, may I suggest that there is one way in which we can get it, and as far as I know, only one way; that is, to treat the farmer like you treat any other businessman in this country. Farm prices today are little more than half what they were 23 years ago, yet industrial wages are three times what they were during that period. At the same time, they tell us that farm wages must not go up or more accurately they say that while farm wages should go up that farm prices out of which these wages must be paid, if they are paid, must be held down. There is no way of letting farm wages go up without letting farm prices go up, too.

If we are to continue to pursue this short-sighted policy, it is my firm conviction that this Nation is absolutely certain to find itself within the course of another year unable to feed not only our allies but our own people. I do not believe the Members of this House realize the desperate seriousness of the situation or we would be demanding as one man that this legislation to do justice to our farmers and give us an opportunity to produce the feed and food and fiber that we need be brought out on this floor so that we might give it a unanimous vote, to do justice to our farmers and to assure our people of a reasonable supply of food in the months to come.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Suppose we had proceeded on the theory that we should have had a reasonable price for tanks and airplanes and guns first, and adequate production of those implements afterward; would we have produced many of them?

Mr. POAGE. I doubt it. I want the gentleman to understand that I have not criticized the fact that we have purchased the tanks and the airplanes and the guns at a high cost.

Mr. CURTIS. Neither have I. Is it not true that the reverse has been true with food? We have said we must have reasonable prices first and adequate production afterward.

Mr. POAGE. That is right. We have emphasized price rather than production. It is just as important to emphasize production of food as to emphasize production of industrial products.

Mr. CURTIS. Should not the Price Control Act be an instrument to produce food rather than to destroy it?

Mr. POAGE. In my opinion, it fails of its fundamental purpose if it is not so used as to encourage the production of food. It is surely much more important to have plenty of food, even at a higher price if necessary, than it is to keep the legal price of food low but have no food to buy.

RENT CONTROL

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD and include therein a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, on January 14, 1943, I addressed this House on rent control. On January 19, 1943, I submitted certain correspondence regarding rent control. Now I want to quote herewith resolution 3128, adopted January 13, 1943, by the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco:

Whereas there exists in San Francisco at the present time an acute housing shortage due to an influx of war workers; and

Whereas we are informed by Federal and industrial authorities that increasingly large numbers of war workers will come to San Francisco during the next few months; and

Whereas, due to exigencies of wartime, new housing accommodations are not being erected; and

Whereas additional housing space to be made available by the National Housing Administration will probably be insufficient; and

Whereas there are thousands of apartment units in San Francisco which are not accommodating the maximum number of occupants; and

Whereas San Franciscans will undoubtedly be called upon to share their housing facilities wherever possible; and

Whereas, under present Office of Price Administration rental regulations, tenants are not permitted to pay nor landlords allowed to charge for extra occupants within a rental unit; and

Whereas a modification of the existing Office of Price Administration regulations with respect to additional occupancy will bring about more cooperation between tenant and landlord, thereby creating additional shelter: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the San Francisco Board of Supervisors, on behalf of the people of San Francisco, realizing and recognizing the vital importance of this problem, does hereby memorialize the Rent Control Division of the Office of Price Administration to amend this regulation in order to permit a reasonable charge for additional tenant occupancy; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the proper Federal agencies, our congressional and senatorial representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

PRODUCTION OF DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the importance of the dairy business is appreciated when we realize that it represents some 20 percent of the national farm income. It is not necessary to call your attention to the fact that the low prices received for manufactured dairy products from 1930 to 1940 were even lower than the 1909–14 prices. This is not the time to try to correct any injustices of the past. Even in 1941 when the program to increase production for lease-lend was launched, cheese was only 16-plus cents per pound and butter only 32-plus cents per pound.

The question today is, what are the facts as to the possibility of producing 122,000,000,000 pounds of milk—the goal for 1943. The goal was 125,000,000,000 in 1942 and 119,000,000,000 pounds were produced—the only agricultural goal that was not attained.

WHAT IS THE STATISTICAL PICTURE?

BUTTER

The production of butter from 1930 to 1942 is listed in the following official table:

Please note that the above table indicates the total national production has been rather well maintained in spite of the diversions of milk to cheese, evaporated milk, and for fluid milk consumption. On January 1, 1943, there were only 25,154,000 pounds in storage, or, as you will note, the least for many years.

CHEESE

American cheese production has come into greater prominence for lease-lend, for domestic consumption, and now for Mr. Lehman's program.

It is estimated that 500,000,000 pounds are needed for lease-lend, and 100,000,000 pounds for Mr. Lehman. This would leave about 300,000,000 pounds for domestic consumption, or considerable reduction in the per capita consumption.

The following official table shows the annual production for the years 1930 to 1942:

Please note that the production of American cheese has shown the remarkable increase of about 50 percent in the last 2 years. In addition, the United States produced about 50,000,000 pounds of Swiss cheese, 25,000,000 pounds of brick cheese, and a large amount of Limburger, Italian, blue, and other foreign types of cheeses. These producers of the foreign-type cheeses have been called upon to fill the demands of the domestic market formerly supplied by imports. The following table shows the cold-storage holdings, or the stock piles, of cheese from 1931 to January 1, 1943:

There are some 17,000,000 cases owned by the Government, 2,000,000 cases of which are now being released to supply the domestic demands last month, and according to the announcement on the radio 3,000,000 cases are to be released for February consumption.

THE PICTURE

The official tables above show the production of the past and what the stock piles are at the present time. In addition to the above dairy production figures, we also have fluid milk but this is immediately consumed and does not enter into the picture of stock piles. The per capita consumption is being rapidly expanded. We must realize that the production of fluid milk is one manpower problem but to convert this milk into cheese, butter, and other manufactured dairy products involves additional manpower. This work requires efficient men and their production is an art. A comparatively small number of men are capable of making these high quality products.

Under normal times, out of every 100 pounds of milk produced in the United States, 42 pounds went into butter production, 29 pounds into city milk distribution, 6 pounds into cheese, 5 pounds into ice cream, 5 pounds into evaporated milk and the remainder into other dairy products, fed to calves, wasted, or lost in manufacture or distribution. It is readily seen that, in the past, butter has been the single product that has required the largest volume of milk. However, these percentages have changed. As you can see, the butter production of the United States has remained rather stationary while the evaporated milk and cheese production has been increased 40 and 50 percent, respectively.

There is one fact evident in all the production tables A, C, and E which really merits your attention. Please note that in table A we have a smaller production of butter beginning September 1942 and that there was considerably less butter produced than during the corresponding months in the year previous. You will note that there was an upswing in production in December 1942, no doubt due to the reduction to 19 percent in the butterfat content of cream. This increase in production may also have been due to the regulations as to the butterfat in ice cream and also the curtailment in sales of this product. The first two January 1943 weekly reports show a 4- to 7-percent increase in butter production over the year previous, and last week 1 percent below last year. We could be on the way to ample production of this great food if viewed only from a statistical standpoint.

In table C you will find that, beginning in September 1942, there was a monthly reduction in cheese production in comparison to 1941. This decline in cheese production still exists. The January weekly reports show a decrease of 17 to 24 percent in the national production from the corresponding weeks last year.

The table showing the production of evaporated milk shows that, beginning in August 1942 and continuing up to January 1, 1943, there was a much lower production of evaporated milk than the corresponding months of the previous year. These are not seasonal reductions; they are reductions from the amounts produced for corresponding months of 1941.

WHAT CAUSED THIS REDUCTION?

There are many reasons advanced for this reduction.

First. Many people think that the comment by the metropolitan press, some radio announcers, and some administration officials was largely responsible for this reduced production. As you no doubt remember, the criticism was directed at the farmer in general and at the dairy farmer in particular when the second price-control bill was being considered by Congress.

Second. Others think that the fluid-milk demands due to the increased buying power of the people were a contributing factor. In southern Army camps no doubt the fluid-milk supply comes from plants formerly engaged in the manufacture of butter and cheese.

Third. Others, like the Pure Milk Products Cooperative, an organization whose members produce over a billion pounds of milk a year, appear to believe that the administration has not kept faith with its members and that the results of having the prices drop from $2.25 per hundred to $1.80 per hundred was the contributing cause.

Fourth. Many cheese men believe that the reduction in the price of cheese from 24 cents to 21 cents a pound by the administration, after they had asked for increased production was also a contributing factor in this reduction. Whatever the causes, and whether they were of omission or of commission, the fact remains that 376,000,000 pounds less of evaporated milk, 35,000,000 pounds less of cheese, and 18,000,000 pounds less of butter were produced than the corresponding months a year previous. In terms of fluid milk this would represent a reduction of about one and one-half billion pounds of fluid milk. This reduction occurred during one of the most favorable milk-production seasons that the dairy sections of this country have ever enjoyed. The following table shows the number of dairy cows in the United States for the years 1920 to 1942, inclusive:

Milk cows 2 years old and over

| Year: | |
|---|---|
| 1920 | 21,455,000 |
| 1925 | 22,575,000 |
| 1930 | 23,032,000 |
| 1935 | 26,082,000 |
| 1940 | 24,926,000 |
| 1941 | 25,478,000 |
| 1942 | 26,303,000 |
| 1943 (estimated) | 27,000,000 |

This table shows that we still have plenty of dairy cows, if well fed, to furnish the 119,000,000,000 pounds of milk, or the goal for 1943.

The national average production per cow for 1942 would be 119,000,000,000÷26,000,000 or 4,600 pounds per cow per year. This amount can easily be increased by proper feed and care. There is an abundance of young dairy animals—we still have the stock pile. The January 1 estimates of the number of dairy cows in the country show a further increase in numbers regardless of the numbers which may have been sold as a result of public auctions.

We have been talking about past history. We must all agree that Donald Nelson must have had these dairymen in mind when he told our country that the farmers of our country had done a job not excelled by any other group.

WHAT WILL HAPPEN IN 1943?

In 1943, the dairymen of this country are confronted with greater problems than they were in the previous years. These are:

First. Additional difficulties as to manpower. This does not only involve the farm work but also the men engaged in the manufacture and processing and distribution of the products.

Second. More difficulties in obtaining concentrated feeds. The demand for high proteins has been so extensive. Millions of cows have been fed grain during the pasture season the last couple years that had never had a mouthful before. We might have had a stock of these high proteins sometime in the past but they have passed out of the picture. Not only the increased production of milk but also the increase in the production of eggs and pork have made the demand for these protein feeds.

Third. Problems of machinery and equipment for the farm as well as for the plants that are manufacturing these dairy products.

Fourth. Transportation. This is becoming more and more of a serious problem. It is not going to be reflected only in the production, procurement, and accumulation of feed but also in the accumulation and transportation of the manufactured product itself.

CONSTRUCTIVE SUGGESTIONS

First. It would be well to follow the suggestion of the Pure Milk Products Cooperative and ask the Secretary of Agriculture to issue a specific statement to the dairy farmers to the effect that all their products will be taken at a reasonable price and for a definite period of time.

Second. Fulfill this promise. The Secretary has given the pork producer a time table with a $13.25-per-hundred floor until September 30, 1944.

Third. With all due respect to lease-lend and its objectives, we must realize that we must have a proper consideration for our own food producers. We cannot constantly be changing the product and the marketing of an industry based upon the change of mind of our lease-lend friends. We must, in fairness, do some forward thinking in order that our own industries are not ruined in order to fulfill the wishes of our lease-lend friends. If we continue to follow the footsteps of the past we will really harm the war effort. Hauling milk halfway across the State with its waste of tires and gas to make one dairy product is an example. The recent O. P. A. order on cheese is most assuredly another.

Fourth. Develop a more cooperative spirit between the Department of Agriculture and the legislative committees of Congress and also a more cooperative spirit between the Secretary's office and the farm organizations of our country. Within the past few days, we have had an example of bureaucrats' announcements of huge expenditures without evident knowledge or consultation with the chairman of our Appropriations Committee.

Fifth. A greater use of the educational forces of our country could be realized. This will include our country and city schools, extension service, Coagts, Smith-Hughes teachers in high school, and boys and girls club work. There is an opportunity to broaden the program with education from sources recognized as reliable.

Sixth. A little clearer understanding of the fact that we cannot have a control that prevents all possible production. For all many of these controls are supposed to be out for the duration, there are still many catches in most legislation that do not make for 100-percent production. We cannot have our cake and eat it and we must control the controls so that they do not prevent the maximum production. There are many many examples but the recent cheese order is sufficient. Were the men that milk the cows and make the product ever asked as to how the order would affect them? The 17 to 24 percent lower production may be part of the answer.

I have endeavored to discuss this subject fully from a factual standpoint and trust that the facts as presented may give you a picture of the dairy situation at this time, and I am sure you all know the clouds that are in the skies and want to do your part to continue the production of the greatest food known to man.

CONCLUSION

The demands of war may denude our forests and they may drain our mines of much of our precious metals but the land of our country will be the source of restoring happiness and contentment to our people. No country in history has ever achieved greatness that did not have within its borders large areas of rich, productive, and fertile land. It bids well for the future that our country is blessed with large areas of this type of land. Though it may not be worth but $35,000,000,000 as it was on January 1, 1940, it can, if properly handled, increase in productivity and be a source of protection for our future generations. It can improve with time and this is most assuredly a source of comfort. Let us ask these fertile acres for abundance and ask of it the best crop in 1943 that we have ever witnessed. If these acres are to continue to furnish the food for our armed forces, for our allies, and for liberated peoples, all factors of production must have their merited consideration or we will not be helping these acres to fulfill their mission.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] be permitted to extend his own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article written by Mr. Pegler.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein certain excerpts and statements on three subjects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN] be permitted to extend his own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order of the House, heretofore made, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] for 10 minutes.

PROTECTION OF DOGS

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter from a constituent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday afternoon I had the temerity to take up the time of this House to discuss a couple of pieces of legislation I introduced seeking the humane protection of dogs. A few minutes after that, after I had left the floor, to enjoy my luncheon late in the afternoon with a couple of constitutents from my district, my good friend, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] took occasion to criticize me for having taken up that time of the House of Representatives. He made several rather caustic remarks which appear in the RECORD, and to which I take some exception. In the first place, I have a very high regard for the gentleman from Oklahoma, personally. He has been very kind to me during my service in the House. He is a valuable member of the Committee on Appropriations, and as such, as is true of every other member of that committee, his time is very valuable. I have a very warm political friendship for the gentleman because I owe him a debt of gratitude. Back in 1940 when I was campaigning for reelection, it was reported to me that the gentleman from Oklahoma had been detailed to my congressional district, among others, to bring about my defeat. I am glad to see the gentleman here this afternoon, because our paths have not crossed since he came to Cheboygan to help defeat me. Up until that time I had never been able to carry Cheboygan County, but I did that year, and in the last election I carried it by twice the majority I did before.

But I do not want to take up much of the time of this House today. It is late, and we have heard some very interesting things here on the floor this afternoon. I do not want to take up too much time discussing dogs, but I do point out to the gentleman that while he censored me for taking up the time of the House, it was after the distinguished majority leader had asked unanimous consent and had received unanimous consent for this House to take a 3-day vacation. Therefore I think I might be pardoned for taking up 10 minutes of that time in the manner in which I did, and I may say that during the ensuing 3-day vacation, and despite the bad weather, I have not been entirely idle, nor have I been spending my time on dogs. It so happened on Friday afternoon that a newspaper photographer called at my office and asked to be permitted to take a picture of myself and my dog. I hold that picture before you right now. Some time later this same gentleman called back and asked if I would permit him to take another picture, because the Office of War Information would not permit any picture to be published showing snow on the ground in the Capital; that that is a very serious thing, notwithstanding the fact that every daily newspaper throughout the city for days has been broadcasting comment on the weather conditions in the Nation's Capital. They were commenting upon the fact that we were enjoying the worst storm that we had had for years.

Now, during the very time that this picture was being taken, a pilot was approaching one of the surrounding airports of Washington, flying a very hot plane, and one of these pursuit ships is worth about $150,000—though a fighting plane cannot be measured in terms of dollars—he was approaching one of these airports and he sought to learn the weather conditions on the ground. He wanted to find out whether there was any snow on the airport. He was not permitted to have that particular information as to the conditions on the ground, with the result that when he brought in this super hot plane he nosed over and smashed it up. I suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the Committee on Appropriations might carefully consider many such similar wastes of the taxpayer's money as that, and among other waste of the taxpayer's money, this morning, just this morning, right before my eyes, and within a block of where I stood, on one of the nearby airports in Washington I saw another crew bring in a bomber that I was told cost about $250,000, and they attempted to land that bomber on one of these particular airways, still covered with snow, on which not a plow has been put since the storm started last Friday. On an airport charged, among other things, with the defense of this Capital. Probably because of the fact that the man could not see the number on the particular runway that he had been told that he must use to come in, he attempted to make a down-wind landing. I saw that airplane completely destroyed right before my eyes, due to a mistaken bit of judgment perhaps on the part of the pilot or a misunderstanding of the signals. Those things are serious. We cannot judge the value of an airplane in terms of dollars and cents, but we can judge the fact that that fighter plan, that bomber, because of some mistaken ideas or instructions is at present permanently out of the war picture.

I might suggest to the gentleman on the Appropriations Committee that he might seek a reduction in the appropriation for some of these various New Deal agencies and bureaus that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] mentioned in his admirable address a few minutes ago.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I was present when the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] made his statement with reference to the gentleman from Michigan. If I understood him correctly, he said it was because of the interest shown in such subjects as dogs that the public esteem for Congressmen and for Congress generally had fallen so low. I hardly think that is true, and I would like to make this observation: That it was the voting away repeatedly of the powers and prerogatives of this Congress to other agencies that caused the American people to look with disfavor upon Congress and not because some of them happened to be lovers of dogs.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for his observation, and I may say that in the several hundred letters I have received since I took up the time of the House last Thursday, I have been rather roundly applauded for the fact that somebody took an interest in dogs even under present circumstances. One man said that in this cockeyed world thank God somebody had time for the most sensible animal that we have in the world today, the dog.

But I wanted to make this further observation to the gentleman from Oklahoma. I suggest that the Appropriations Committee drastically limit the funds which have been assigned to the Farm Security Administration. Let me tell you what they are doing up in my district, which goes right back to Cheboygan County again. Government bureaucrats, to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] referred, have been going around that district drumming up a farmers' cooperative association among the farmers of that district. There are three bureau chiefs in Cheboygan County that have been organizing this farmers' cooperative. They said originally it was to be a cooperative simply to warehouse and dispose of their farm produce in that area. The farmers have been asked to buy shares of stock or bonds in the organization, with a $10 contribution. Then they announced, after they had organized, that they were going into a general merchandising business of all descriptions, competing with practically all the merchants in Cheboygan County. They are getting their working capital for that project from the Farm Security Administration. I have a petition, signed by practically every merchant in Cheboygan, asking why Congress does not wake up and put a stop to such practice on the part of these Federal bureaucrats. Here we have men sweating blood night and day figuring out how they can meet their pay rolls, how they can buy War bonds and War stamps, and so on, yet we have the Federal Government bureaucrats running around deliberately subsidizing farmers' cooperatives in order to put these same individuals out of business.

I would suggest that perhaps the Appropriations Committee, in its wisdom, might find out that they can considerably reduce the appropriation for the Federal Communications Commission. I have always understood it to be against the regulations of the Federal Communications Commission for anybody to swear over the radio. Yet last night if you heard Walter Winchell, he said your constituents and my constituents who voted to return any of the pre-Pearl Harbor isolationists last fall "were plain damn fools." How much longer are you going to permit this man Winchell to get away with that stuff and violate the regulations of the Federal Communications Commission, with impunity?

Those are some of the suggestions I want to make at this time. There are some others. There are some splendid suggestions in this letter which I will include at this point in the RECORD, which I received from the editor of a small weekly paper in my district, a paper published in Gaylord, Mich. It is as follows:

GAYLORD PRINTING CO.,
Gaylord, Mich., January 23, 1943.

Hon. FRED BRADLEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRED: Your letter regarding the outcome of your interview with Major Canning, re the removal of the Ordnance Service Command repair shop here, received, and personally, as well as for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, want to thank you for prompt action.

We did not hold out much hope of retaining the present set-up, or expect another group to come in. Our purpose was to acquaint you with the situation here in the hope that being cognizant with the situation, its central location, advantages of rail and road transportation, and a general understanding of the situation not only Gaylord, but other small towns within your district, are faced with.

Our ability to buy stamps and bonds is necessarily greatly curtailed as well as our general business, which is going to materially reduce our effort to do our civilian job of helping win the war, and Fred, we are consecrated to that big job. Our sons and brothers and fathers, and our sisters too, are in there pitching. In a small community you know everyone. And when one is called, it is a personal loss to the rest of us as individuals.

It is disgusting to hear official Washington talk about our lack of war consciousness. They don't know anything about it. We in these small communities are cutting out, voluntarily, many items that have been regarded as necessities, because we want our boys and girls on the front, to have them or other things to make their jobs easier.

We do not spend for pleasures, consciously remembering that when we have a desire for a soda, a dinner party, a show, and so forth, that if we do not go, or do what we have in mind, we will be able to put that much more money in stamps and bonds.

We have cut down in employment, and are working longer and harder hours, so that it will release more for the armed forces and defense plants, and provide more money for bonds. We are getting along without many essential things in our businesses because by not getting them it will release that much more to the war effort.

Is official Washington doing as much?

We are in this fight with all we have. We kick and complain, not because we must get along without some things, but because all we get from Washington is free advice as to what we should do, then the next day read of where Washington has done this or that which retards, rather than advances our war aims.

Our Government is making us all very socialistic minded, and this will undermine our so-called democracy unless there are some changes. We don't want it, as a people, but it is being forced upon us, and before the threat of losing our individuality, so apparent in all the actions of Washington in the past few years, Mr. John Q. Public is going to use his franchise to defeat bureaucracy, and this spells defeat to democracy.

But enough of that, so referring back to our subject.

It is our hope that with the knowledge you now have of our situation, you will use your good offices in watching developments so that if anything breaks you have the information that may make it possible for you to assist us in making use of the fine buildings that will soon be idle, and which are surely needed for some type of war or peace work.

With every best wish for your success, and again thanking you in the name of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the people of Gaylord and Otsego County, I am

Very truly yours,

PAUL MACDONALD.

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I would not ask for the indulgence of the House for this brief time at so late an hour had the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY], who has just addressed the House, not taken so serious exceptions to remarks made by me a few days ago, with reference to his proposed dog-security legislation. The gentleman reminds me that I spoke in one of the splendid cities of his district during the campaign of 1940. I am sorry if my appearance in Michigan offended him. The people of Michigan were very kind, courteous, and hospitable to me then. I did not criticize the gentleman in his own district merely because I do not agree with him politically. Incidentally, I spoke in 15 other States of the Union during that memorable campaign and I am glad to say I did not say an unkind word personally against any sitting Member of Congress.

I want to assure the gentleman from Michigan that I certainly hold no ill will toward him. He as a very affable gentleman and I have a high regard for him personally. Nothing that I said on the floor of the House could possible be construed as reflecting on his character, integrity, or reputation as a gentleman.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield, gladly.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. One remark to which I took exception was the suggestion of the gentleman that if I sought the protection of dogs I should go to the city council. Now, what is the city council of Washington if it is not the District of Columbia Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I would say to the gentleman that had he gone before the District of Columbia Committee it would in my judgment have been a little more in keeping with the dignity of this House rather than to introduce a couple of bills that seem to me more for the mutual welfare of dogs of the District of Columbia and the United States than for the protection of the public.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I shall be pleased to again yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I may say to the gentleman that I discussed the matter in advance with the chairman of the committee and several other members, and with the corporation counsel, and that they had advised me to introduce a bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Very well. That may be sufficient explanation to the gentleman's constituents for having introduced the dog legislation in question in the Congress of the United States, but frankly, I am afraid the corporation counsel and others have gotten my friend out on the proverbial limb.

Today the esteemed gentleman from Michigan, who spent his entire 10 minutes last week talking about dogs in general and his own dog in particular, side-steps the issue to discuss airports, airplanes, the Dies committee, and the splendid speech of the gentleman from Texas today, with whom few Members of this House could possibly disagree, and the fact that undesirable bureaucrats have infested some of the departments of Government. Permit me to compliment the gentleman on his speech today. I must say in all frankness, it was much more statesmanlike and constructive than his address of last week for the uplift of dogdom.

Can it be possible, however, that the gentleman would like for the Congress and his constituents to forget about his speech on canine activities and the security of dogs by side-stepping the issue? After all this little friendly argument started when the gentleman introduced his two bills for the relief of dogs, rather than for the relief of the public.

In my previous remarks I did not criticize the gentleman's bill at all. I did not read the bill at that time and I would not wish to embarrass the gentleman by reading all of it into the RECORD now, but I have one of the gentleman's bills here, and I am sure he would like for me to call special attention to some of its provisions. I see that there are three provisions in his bill. Provision No. 1 makes it a crime, punishable by 30 days in jail or a fine of $100 or both, to injure a dog. But the gentleman's bill is strangely silent with reference to protection for the man, woman, boy, or girl who might be injured by a vicious dog. As I walked nearly a mile through the snow this morning to catch a bus to come to the Capitol there were three large, vicious dogs that ran for a block after, and almost attacked, a little girl. A very elderly lady came along. The same dogs followed her for a block. Under the provisions of the gentleman's bill, had anyone taken a club and clubbed one of those vicious dogs, unless he immediately reported it to the police, they would be a criminal and be liable to 30 days in jail or $100 fine or both for kicking a dog that might bite a child. After all there are a few bad, vicious dangerous dogs as well as a lot of good faithful ones.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. There are laws on the statute books at the present time that provide for the legal relief of those people. The owners of the dogs are criminally liable if they let such dogs run loose. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. But the point is there are too many such vicious dogs running loose here, but apparently the gentleman is not as deeply concerned about them as he is about protecting the dogs of the District and Nation, judging from his pet bills. Under the provisions of the gentleman's bill, if a stray dog should come to your house, whether or not you have a telephone—and there are thousands of good people who have no telephones in Washington—you would be liable if you did not call up the dog catcher and report it, did not give the number of the dog's tag or whatever identification there was on him, if there were any—you would be made a criminal under the provisions of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Within 48 hours.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Within 48 hours. Even then you would have to have a telephone. A young man came to my office this afternoon and said he had been trying to get a telephone for 6 months, but had been unable to get one. Now, I submit that is going pretty far, and I again respectfully suggest that it is beneath the dignity of this House to discuss, much less seriously consider, such an absurd proposal.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. The gentleman knows what the practice is today right in the District of Columbia: People will call up the poundmaster and say, "Have you had a call for a brown and white dog about 14 inches high?"

"Who is calling?"

"It is none of your business. Have you had a call for such a dog?"

Many dogs are stolen that way. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Well, I must confess that I am not familiar with what the public says to the dog catcher over the telephone. But the gentleman also knows that I made it plain in my first brief remarks that I am fond of good, faithful dogs. As I stated heretofore, my own little boy has a dog that he loves very much. But let me again respectfully suggest that there are far greater issues here than the protection of dogs, good, bad, or indifferent. Every day we are reminded that there is a real crime wave in Washington. The police and the F. B. I. are overworked here in our Capital City. Last night a man was murdered with a few blocks of this Capitol Building. With the F. B. I. and the police undermanned and begging for additional help to enforce the law and run down saboteurs, then the gentleman would not seriously contend that Congress should make them dog catchers.

Moreover, there are some fine boys from Michigan and other States who are fighting for this country, for what we like to call the American way of life. The present world situation is entirely too serious for Congress to "fiddle while Rome burns" by going off on little side issues.

This is a war Congress, not a dog Congress nor a canine show. Let's not have it said of us that we got there too late with too little.

So much for the gentleman's proposed dog legislation that the Corporation Council or someone suggested he introduce. Now the gentleman comes along and offers some very appropriate suggestions with reference to some things that he thinks the Appropriations Committee ought to do. As a member of that committee and as chairman of the subcommittee of that committee, I welcome his valuable suggestions and I am willing to discuss them for a moment in order to help the gentlemen get from off that limb with as little damage as possible. Concerning the gentleman's suggestion that all appropriations be cut, I will say that even though the Interior Department is more closely connected with the war effort save and except the War and Navy Departments, that last year I brought that bill to the floor of the House, reduced more than $18,000,000 below the budget estimates after the Secretary of the Interior had voluntarily cut his own department $10,000,000 below the estimates submitted by the Bureau of the Budget. I feel that I can say with all modesty that is a record for which my committee has a just reason to be proud. May I also add in that connection that early in our hearings a year ago, we inquired of the Secretary's office about the alleged subversive activities, or activities of any other crackpots that might be in that department. Our committee was assured by officials in position to speak with authority, that the F. B. I. had combed the Department of the Interior, as it were, with a fine comb and that anyone even suspected of advocating the overthrow of the Government by force, had been weeded out by that department. I can assure the gentleman that no money in any of the appropriation bills will become available if I can prevent it, by any bureaucrat who would bite the hand that is feeding him and who advocates the overthrow, by force, of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma, [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he is suggesting that when the gentleman from Michigan showed interest in a local matter or local ordinance in the city of Washington relating to dogs he was neglecting the welfare of the men and women of the armed forces from the State of Michigan?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am giving the facts as I see them. I am casting no insinuations. The record will show whether or not the gentleman from Michigan has expressed the same interest in the human beings of his district as he has in the dogs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. The voters of my district seemed to think that I showed enough interest in them to be reelected, and also in the boys in the armed forces from the State of Michigan, and I yield nothing to the gentleman from Oklahoma in reference to my votes for the war effort.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Well, I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. Again I suggest that the record speaks for itself.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like an answer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. If the gentleman wants to make a speech, he can make it.

Mr. CURTIS. No. I am asking the gentleman a question and I am trying to get an answer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will answer it.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to know if the gentleman feels that the gentleman from Michigan has neglected his duties, or did he have some other reason for making answer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Oh, the gentleman is attempting to side-step the issue. But again I desire to make it very plain that I have no ill will toward the gentleman from Michigan, and that I have a very high regard for him personally. Let us not befuddle the issue. I did not start this dog business. If it has embarrassed the gentleman, I submit in all candor that is not my fault. I again say that the legislation proposed by the gentleman, important that it evidently appears to him, might wait until after the end of this terrible war which is going to settle the future of this generation and generations yet unborn.

HAS CONGRESS VOTED AWAY ITS POWERS AND PREROGATIVES?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Nebraska does not leave because I want to make a suggestion about a statement that has often been made about Congress voting away its powers and prerogatives. I wonder if the Congress has been voting away its powers and prerogatives?

Under the Constitution of the United States the Congress has the lawmaking power. We make the laws. We do not execute the laws. Obviously, we must leave the execution of the laws to the Executive. Under the Constitution the executive department of the Government executes the laws.

This being true, it is within our rights and it is our duty to pass the laws and leave the execution of the laws up to the President. I know there have been many mistakes made in the execution of the laws that have been passed by the Congress. I think though the people keep in mind—I am sure we do as we are elected by the people of our respective districts and States to serve in the House and Senate—that the President of the United States is also elected by the people of this Nation for the purpose of executing the laws that we pass.

Obviously the President himself cannot execute all these laws. He must delegate this power to others, and if he delegates the power to someone who is not a good administrator, it is true that the Congress is criticized, and if the Congress should be criticized, well and good. But should the Congress be criticized because some poor administrator is selected? I know that in the case of a war like we are in now, with a huge program involving tens of billions of dollars a year, mistakes will be made, and serious mistakes will be made. I think the people expect mistakes to be made. I am sure that the Congress expects the Executive to make a reasonable number of mistakes. But I feel that the Congress has the right to expect and the people have the right to expect that those mistakes will be quickly corrected when discovered.

Congress has been blamed for the poor administration of the price-control law. Our critics doubtless favor such a law in order to prevent runaway prices and inflation. What they object to is the manner of its enforcement, which is something over which we do not have control.

I think the greatest criticism that has come to the administrators in the executive department recently has been because of their failure to correct their mistakes quickly. I do not think Congress should assume all the responsibility, because we merely pass the laws; we do not execute them. I seriously invite that to the attention of the gentleman and others for consideration, because, as we have our duty and responsibility, so the Executive has a duty and responsibility. It is our duty to work with the executive department as much as we can. If a law is not properly administered, I think Congress should deal with it not by putting somebody out of office—because Congress does not have the power to put him out of office in the absence of grounds for impeachment and did not have the power to appoint him in the first place—but by either repealing the law or changing the law by amendment. To that extent only our power is granted to us under the Constitution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. I cannot quarrel with what the gentleman says. I am very much in accord with his statement that the Congress suffers because of the sins and errors of the administrative branch.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas read in tomorrow's RECORD the remarks of one of his colleagues from Texas, because I am sure they will show that if anyone in this House is a little bit critical of the things that have happened, that criticism comes from the gentleman's side of the House.

May I further say to my colleague that I agree with what he has said because many of our troubles are our own troubles. We passed the price-control bill but voted against the Wolcott amendment, which would have ironed out a lot of the kinks in the price-control bill.

Mr. PATMAN. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that mistakes have been made. The criticism I have of those administrators is that they have not quickly corrected those mistakes when discovered. I know some of the errors of these administrators have remained uncorrected, and I regret that very much. In a huge program such as we have now under way, certainly a number of mistakes will be made; but let us hope they will be reduced to a minimum and quickly corrected when discovered.

The main point I want to make is, Why should we say we are voting away our powers and prerogatives? I do not agree with that statement at all. We are merely passing the laws. It is not within our power to enforce them. The criticism comes from enforcement of the laws, but it is not our power to enforce them, and we cannot enforce them. So, why say we are voting away our powers and prerogatives?

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE COAST GUARD ACADEMY

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES,
January 27, 1943.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, close as the air that wraps us round, for breath and work, for success and hope, and for the privilege of sharing in human joy, we praise Thee. At all times, in every hour of stress, help us to realize that Thy wisdom never errs and Thy judgment never fails. We ask not for ease, nor for the approval of men, but for Thy blessing upon every task that it may have a place in Thy eternal purpose, steadily driving its roots into the nourishing earth of the will of Him who feels and hears our appeal on the other side of silence.

Thou hast taught us that the highest joy of existence is in the renouncing of self that we may help others. Our debt to this sorrowing world, dear Lord, is not discharged by a trifle of silver or gold, nor by the garment of praise. We give thanks to our Saviour who paused over the call of human need with a lowly spirit of self-renunciation. Oh, let us forget all things in the preciousness of His example.

"Greatly begin; though thou have time
But for a line, be that sublime—
Not failure, but low aim is crime."

Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AUTHORIZING COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO CONDUCT STUDIES AND EXAMINATIONS

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (H. Res. 69, Rept. No. 81) for printing in the RECORD:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, acting as a whole or by subcommittee or subcommittees thereof appointed by the chairman of such committee for the purposes of this resolution, is authorized to conduct such studies and examination of the organization and operation of any executive department or any other executive agency (including any agency the majority of the stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States) as the committee may deem necessary to assist it in connection with the determination of matters within its jurisdiction.

For the purposes of this resolution, such committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books or papers or documents or vouchers by subpena or otherwise, and to take such testimony and records as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee, or by any person designated by him, and shall be served by such person or persons as the chairman of the committee or subcommittee may designate. The chairman of the committee or subcommittee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order today for 5 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that that time be extended to 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AMOUNT RECEIVED BY PRODUCERS OF ORANGES

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, a typical example of the relation between the price paid by consumers for oranges and the amount of that price which goes to the growers, the pickers, the handlers, and the packers of that fruit is as follows: The consumers in the case of one typical carload in New York paid 42 cents a dozen. Out of that 42 cents the price which the grower received was approximately 6 cents. The pickers, handlers, and packers received 6 cents. Nine cents went to freight. Nine cents went to the wholesale merchants and 12 cents to the retail merchants. Here is one of the major problems in connection with agricultural production and a fair return to farmers for their crops. Here is an example of the very wide spread between the return to the farmer and the price which the consumer pays.

Mr. RANKIN. How much did those racketeers who stand guard at the gates of New York get for permitting them to bring that material in?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I will say to the gentleman that these oranges came in by railroad.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, California Senate Joint Resolution No. 10, relative to memorializing the President, the Congress, the Secretary of the Interior, and the War Production Board with respect to the urgency of prompt completion of all studies of all units of the Central Valley water project.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an editorial from the Eugene (Oreg.) Register-Guard.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and include an article from the Reader's Digest for February.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein the aims and objectives of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an open letter to the Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, after the conclusion of business on the Speaker's desk and disposition of other special orders on tomorrow, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WALTER WINCHELL

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that someone in that organization which manufactures this stuff which people put on their hands and face, a sort of lotion I believe they call it, does not advise their spokesman and salesman, Walter Winchell, that it does not pay to kick anybody's dog around. It does not pay to bite the hand that feeds you. It is doubtful if it is good salesmanship to tell prospective customers that they are dumb. Walter told us last Sunday that there were some 14,000,000 damn fools in America who voted for Members of Congress. I wonder whether he thinks he is going to persuade any of those 14,000,000 to buy that lotion sold by his sponsors? What do you think of trying to sell something and telling the fellow you are trying to sell it to that he is a damn fool?

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of other special orders today I may be allowed to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WHILE THE VALIANT DIE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a front-page editorial which appeared in the Commercial Appeal, at Memphis, Tenn., on last Sunday, entitled "While the Valiant Die." I hope every mother and every father and everyone else who has anybody in the service will read that editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ACQUISITION OF LAND BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, in October of last year the War Department began the acquisition of a tract of farm lands in Anderson and Roane Counties in my district comprising in area 56,000 acres. There were living upon that tract at that time and cultivating the farms which they owned more than 1,000 farm families. At that time in my section of the country they begin to prepare their lands for fall sowing.

The Government followed up the announcement of that project by the institution of condemnation suits against the owners of those lands. They sent into that area of my State land appraisers who had formerly appraised land for land-loan banks to put an appraised land valuation upon the homes of those farmers. I have in my possession more than 100 protests, many of them sworn to, stating that those appraisers have fixed a valuation upon those lands in many instances only one-third their actual value.

Those tillers of the soil, those people who themselves and their ancestors have lived in the area for more than a hundred years and who have spilled their blood in every war waged for this country in all its history, and whose boys are now on fighting fronts in every part of the world, are now being evicted from their homes with less than enough money to anywhere in that area duplicate their homesteads by the purchase of farms of the same value. On yesterday I introduced a resolution providing for the appointment by the Speaker of a committee composed of five Members of this House with full power to investigate the injustice that is being done these farmers and landowners of my district. They are asking no more than simple justice when they insist that their Government pay them the real value of their homes, based on present-day valuations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in connection with the Central Valley and include therein a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 1648) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 87), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order.

FLOATING DRYDOCKS

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 87.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of House Resolution 1446, a bill authorizing appropriations for the United States Navy for additional ship repair facilities, and for other purposes That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of the time on the rule to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and yield myself 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, this rule was unanimously reported by the Rules Committee. The resolution has for its purpose the building of floating drydocks. The reason for this is obvious, because of our naval activities in all parts of the world where there is no provision made for the repairing of our ships which may have been attacked by the enemy or may have met with an accident. The necessity for these docks must appear to all to be a practical necessity. This also applies to the acquisition of land. This may appear strange to some of us—why land should be necessary for floating drydocks. This can be explained by saying that it is apparent that a floating drydock could not possibly carry all the utensils necessary to repair our ships.

I think it is not necessary for me to indulge further, except to say that we of the Rules Committee thought this legislation not only necessary, but imperative. This legislation was unanimously adopted by the Naval Affairs Committee, and you will hear from the chairman of that committee the reasons for it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use, and ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. TABER. A thing about this bill I should like to have discussed is whether or not the Committee on Naval Affairs has had hearings on the specific items of real estate it is proposed to purchase? I feel that the war effort would be promoted if the committee would go into these things as they used to and make specific authorizations for specific items.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield with pleasure to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee to answer the question.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. May I say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that if he will read the report he will see that it may not be necessary to acquire any particular property in connection with this program. We did, however, make inquiry about it, as we do about all acquisition of land. This subject matter will be debated either under general debate or under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. COLE of New York. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Georgia might also advise the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that a bill is pending before the committee to withdraw from the Department authority to acquire any land unless it is approved by the committee and by Congress.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York again yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. May I say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], ranking minority member on the Appropriations Committee, that we are endeavoring to ascertain from the Navy what it intends to do with reference to the spending of money that has been given to the Department in blanket form.

Mr. TABER. I think that should be done. We should be specific about our authorizations and our appropriations.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman, and with the cooperation of the Appropriations Committee I am satisfied we shall be very successful.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. I would suggest to the membership that they remain on the floor after the rule is adopted and listen to the statement to be made by the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee as to the purchase of this land. I raised the same point in the Rules Committee and I was satisfied that the Naval Affairs Committee had ascertained that only such land was to be purchased as was necessary in the construction of the facilities to implement these drydocks that might be placed on foreign soil.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. May I call the gentleman's attention and the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the report states:

The bill also provides authority for the acquisition of land, but it is not now definitely known that it will be necessary to exercise the authority.

Permit me to say, if the gentleman will yield me time, that if it becomes necessary in the construction of a drydock to acquire land, instead of holding up that program and coming back here and saying that "we want 10 acres or 20 acres at a certain place," the Secretary should have the discretion to acquire this land and notify the Congress just as soon as he has done so.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes before the House with the unanimous report of the Rules Committee. It authorizes the expenditure of some $210,000,000 to construct new drydocks and ship-repair facilities to repair ships of various categories. I am very glad of an opportunity to advocate legislation that brings to my district certain governmental work. This bill provides for the building of three drydocks at Newburgh, N. Y., which will cost $600,000 apiece. Although I have been voting for naval appropriation bills for years running into many billions of dollars, I am particularly glad now to vote for a bill that authorizes the expenditure of $1,800,000 at the Newburgh shipyard in my district and thereby provide employment for people living there and in that vicinity. This will be very thankfully received in my district and I hope we will receive some additional contracts later on.

Mr. Speaker, I confess I had some little difficulty in getting the facts from the Navy Department. This morning I called up and was assured that Admiral Robinson would give me the information that I wanted about this bill, but he never did. I had to call the Navy Department three times and finally got another admiral after 12 o'clock to give me the information I desired. We are having considerable difficulty with bureaucrats, but I did not know that that type of disease had spread to the Navy Department. I hope that the delay and buck passing that I experienced this morning is not typical of the Navy, but rather the exception to the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I asked to speak out of order because this is, after all, a Navy bill and what I propose to speak on has not only to do with the Navy but the Army and the State Department. In fact, it has to do primarily with our foreign policy. This is the first time I have spoken in Congress, since December 14, when I resigned from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in reference to our foreign policies. I propose to devote 15 minutes this afternoon during the consideration of the rule to giving my ideas as to what I think should be done to help win the war.

I have no patience with those Americans, members of both parties—I specifically refer to the PM, Daily Worker, and radical press—who have been sniping and criticizing the policy of the State Department, and particularly Secretary Hull, because of his recognition of the Vichy government prior to our invasion of north Africa. It seems to me that the diplomacy of Secretary Hull in connection with the recognition of the Vichy government and our invasion of north Africa was the greatest military, naval, and diplomatic victory of the war. In my opinion, he deserves the highest commendation, not condemnation, for making it possible for the American Army to land troops in Morocco with few losses and take over all of Morocco and Algiers, and at the same time secure the support of the French Army there of some 300,000, who had sworn their allegiance to Marshal Petain. Today that army is on our side instead of fighting and killing American soldiers. It was a great bloodless victory, and it was due in large part to the diplomacy of the State Department. If it were not for that fact, we would not be fighting now in Tunisia. We would, instead, be fighting the French forces in Africa. We would have to be guarding the railroads and highways for over a thousand miles and our supply line from Casablanca to Tunisia. Therefore I want to go on record as protesting this criticism and sniping by members of both parties and the radical press, particularly by one of the foremost leaders of the Republican Party who has constantly been attacking Secretary Hull, who made possible our almost bloodless invasion of north Africa and secured the support of the French forces there afterward.

Mr. Speaker, on November 18, 1942, I sent the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, the following letter, which I have not released until now:

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have just read the statement made by Wendell Willkie before the Herald Tribune Forum criticizing the State Department for its policy toward the Vichy government prior to the landing of our troops in Morocco and Algeria.

Mr. Willkie speaks for himself and not the Republican Party. I want you to know that I regard your handling of the difficult and complicated Vichy problem to have shown vision and the highest statesmanship. Your foresight, which permitted our troops to land in north Africa almost unopposed, resulted in the greatest diplomatic, military, and naval victory of the war.

With high regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

HAMILTON FISH.

That was in November. This criticism has kept on right up to the present time. We are concerned with only one thing, and that is winning the war. On that we are united, Republicans and Democrats, and winning the war at the earliest possible moment.

Why should we drag politics into a difficult and complicated situation? After the war let the French decide what kind of government they want in France, but in the meantime let us get on with the war, and let us take into our Army and on our side the French troops in north Africa which formerly lined up with Marshal Petain. Our successful invasion of Algeria ought to give us a springboard or base of operations against southern Europe and shorten the war.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Does not the gentleman think that criticism such as he is condemning is calculated to render a disservice to the country in time of war and might be misinterpreted by our allies and by our enemies and by our own people? I think the gentleman is exactly right in condemning that character of criticism at this time.

Mr. FISH. I agree with the gentleman. Lieutenant General Eisenhower, who represents us in north Africa, is an able general and administrator who knows what is best for the Army, and we ought to support him in his decisions aimed to help our armed forces and expedite victory. To constantly harp and criticize and impugn the motives of General Eisenhower and the State Department is not rendering a service to our own country, our armed forces, or promoting unity among the Allies.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Some of these critics who are thousands of miles from that area have no information with reference to the existing facts there and are not in position to criticize even if it were proper for them to do so.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. May I say to the gentleman from New York that on yesterday I called attention to the attack made by a man named Stone. When Secretary Hull asked him what his real name was I think it developed it was Bernstein or Finestein. He is one of the pen pushers on this communistic publication known as PM. The most disappointing thing and the one thing that most patriotic Americans will resent is the editorial attack on Secretary Hull in last Sunday's issue of the Washington Post. I believe Secretary Hull, President Roosevelt, and those men who are responsible for bringing about the conditions that now exist in north Africa deserve the commendation of every patriotic American and not the abuse and criticism that is being hurled at them by certain elements throughout the country.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have taken this time to make certain suggestions as to our foreign policy.

I do not claim to be a military expert or strategist, and speak today as a layman interested in winning the war at the earliest possible moment. I urge the following three-point program:

First. The creation of a Supreme Allied War Council, as we had in the last war, composed of representatives from the United States, Great Britain, Soviet Russia, and China, with equal rights for all to plan, coordinate, and carry out the final victory campaign and to prepare for the peace to follow. There should also be military representatives from all the conquered territories.

Second. To increase our efforts to supply China with a larger share of our lease-lend weapons, particularly airplanes.

If there is any nation that has earned the respect and admiration of the American people it is China, which, with 3,000,000 poorly equipped soldiers, has been fighting Japan for 6 years. Why not arm and equip additional millions of available Chinese? Why not build numerous airfields and provide China with 500 fighter planes and 500 bombers to enable her to take the offensive? Where there is a will there is a way. Concentrate on getting airplanes to China and when that has been solved the bombing of Japanese cities, war industries, and shipping will begin.

Why not persuade Soviet Russia, now that she has defeated the German armies, to permit American planes from Alaska to land on Soviet airfields in Siberia and continue on to China? We have furnished over a billion dollars of lease-lend supplies to Russia, and she might be willing to reciprocate to that extent without even asking the use of her airfields to bomb Japan.

Third. Place General MacArthur in supreme command of all the Allied forces in the far Pacific.

Now that "Dear Eddie" Flynn has thrown in the sponge before the battle had even started for confirmation as Minister to Australia and Ambassador to the far reaches of the Pacific Ocean, would it not expedite victory by making General MacArthur the supreme commander of all Allied forces in the Far East? He has the confidence of the American people, who know him as the ablest, the most brilliant, and most experienced fighting general in our Army. If his name should be sent to the Senate, it would be approved unanimously for any office.

Give General MacArthur the armed forces, airplanes, and ships and he will find a way to open up the road to Tokyo. Inadequate forces mean inadequate attacks on small islands and outposts of the Japanese Empire. The island-hopping campaign began 6 months ago and might go on for 6 years without reaching the heart of Japan. We have been merely bruising the fingers or outer edges of the Rising Sun Empire.

The Japs, in a sneak attack on Pearl Harbor, began the war 14 months ago, and in spite of the statements of various public officials prior to Pearl Harbor that we could crush the Japanese Navy in 2 weeks' time and take Tokyo in 3, we are still a long way from it. It is about time we struck at the head and heart of Japan and not at its fingers and toes.

The American people want to bring the war to an end by defeating and crushing the enemies. Japan not only started the war but took the Philippines from us, and the American people are beginning to ask why do we not get on with the war; why do we not bomb Japan.

Why not place General MacArthur in supreme command and furnish him with sufficient troops, airplanes, and ships to open up an all-out campaign on the Japs before they become entrenched in their new possessions and have exploited the natural resources in oil, rubber, metals, and food to develop and expand their home war industries? Is there any sound reason why General MacArthur, our greatest fighting general to date, is not given supreme command and an army of a million or more men supported by a huge air force and the Navy? I have sufficient faith in General MacArthur to believe he would drive the Japs out of Burma, Borneo, and Sumatra and carry the fight to the heart of Japan.

Mr. Speaker, I want to read into the RECORD an article that appeared in the New York Times of this morning, by Madame Koo, wife of the Chinese envoy to Great Britain.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. May I ask the gentleman about his first point, a unified command. I think we can all visualize the desirability of that. A command headed by Russia, China, the United States, and Great Britain would be most desirable if we all had common enemies. However, does not this element enter into the situation? Would not the fact that Russia and Japan have not yet declared war on each other, that they are not belligerents each against the other, complicate the situation as to having a unified command, when all the nations are not fighting the same enemies?

Mr. FISH. If that were true and really material, then it would be very easy to have a unified command in the Pacific and another unified command in the Atlantic, putting, say, Great Britain, the United States, and China on one side in the Pacific, and the United States, Great Britain, and Russia in the Atlantic. I think you can divide it up, if necessary, but the main point is to arrange for a supreme allied war council and if necessary divided into the Atlantic and Pacific sections.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. It would not be a unified command, it would be two commands.

Mr. FISH. You could divide the supreme command, in the Pacific and Atlantic sections, although I do not think the difference is so material. There should be a supreme allied war council right now and every day's delay impairs our united war efforts and the winning of the war.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. I was very much interested in the gentleman's three points. I wonder if before the gentleman takes his seat he will give us the benefit of his view about a fourth point, a statement of the peace aims of the United Nations.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has asked a very pertinent question, What are our peace aims? For a long time I have thought it was advisable for the Congress to ask the President to state to the American people and the world exactly what our peace aims are, and to state in concrete language what we are fighting for, and our program for maintaining peace after the war. I believe millions of soldiers in our armed forces ought to be told definitely what our peace aims are, and that it would likewise have favorable reaction in the conquered nations and the few remaining neutral nations.

Mr. LUDLOW. Would it not be beneficial if the terribly oppressed people in the nations abroad knew that we had a really altruistic peace aim, and if that knowledge could percolate through those foreign countries?

Mr. FISH. I think it would be highly advisable to explain our peace aims to the entire world. I am sure our peace aims are altruistic and unselfish and should appeal to all the world and to all the people in conquered territory suffering from aggression and starvation. Certainly nobody on either side of this House has the faintest idea of our engaging in any form of imperialism after victory has been secured. We do not want any additional territory. Of course, it is pretty hard to make people believe that we are fighting for the "four freedoms" because, if that is so, then we would have to make an exception of Soviet Russia. The people want to know exactly what we are fighting for, and they are entitled to know and particularly those in our armed forces.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Does not the gentleman think our peace aims are fully and clearly set out in what is commonly known as the Atlantic Charter?

Mr. FISH. No; I do not. I have read the Atlantic Charter many times. I approve of most of it. However, it is very vague and in general terms. It was produced by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill as a joint statement 4 months before we entered the war and has never been considered by the Congress. The Atlantic Charter does not contain anything about freedom of speech, freedom of the press, or freedom of religion. It does say that the people of each country may determine their own form of government. That is the most important statement in the Atlantic Charter, and will appeal to the people in the conquered territories. It means that we are not going to impose any form of government—democracy, monarchy, or any other kind—on any of the foreign nations.

Mr. MAY. Regarding the gentleman's other line of argument, that the Allied Nations ought to strike now at the head and heart of Japan instead of at the fingers and toes, does the gentleman have any doubt that the armed forces—the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps—are doing everything on earth they can to do that?

Mr. FISH. I have considerable doubt. I do not believe there are sufficient forces in Australia to carry on a major campaign against the Japanese. I think everybody knows that we cannot conduct a major offensive against the Japanese because we do not have the necessary armed forces and we do not have sufficient airplanes, to carry on a major campaign.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman doubt that the armed forces of this country are doing everything that it is humanly possible to do?

Mr. FISH. Certainly not. Every one of our men is fighting as hard as he can and doing a brilliant and brave job in the jungle fighting on Guadalcanal and New Guinea. We do not have the men, we do not have the equipment, and we do not have the airplanes to start a major offensive against Japan. Our men are doing everything they can in attacking a few islands, which I described as the fingers and toes of Japan, but not the heart and head of Japan.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not assume the gentleman read my remarks of 2 weeks ago wherein I forcibly expressed the point that no blueprint, no definite aims, should be drawn up.

Mr. FISH. I heard that speech. It was an excellent one in some respects.

Mr. GIFFORD. No one here took exception to those remarks, and I waited and waited here, and today the gentleman demands a definiteness of purpose that would remove some of our allies from us. Only generalizations should be indulged in at the moment, but that is not what I rose for.

Mr. FISH. It was the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] who spoke about the proposed peace terms. I was talking about three specific proposals that I believe will help expedite winning the war.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman this morning is defending the State Department. How unusual for him to do that.

Mr. FISH. That is right, but I am glad to do it whenever it is deserving of it.

Mr. GIFFORD. And I am glad to hear it. Perhaps it is high time somebody challenge these constant shafts against Mr. Willkie. I did take him for a long ride here after he returned, but I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON] that Mr. Willkie did stop at north Africa, and that he made a tour of the several nations, and he does know as much as some of us, and he did promise these nations sympathy, help, everything, and the gentleman should not worry about those nations losing sight of that.

Mr. FISH. There is one thing about Mr. Willkie. He can always talk for himself, he always has and will probably continue to do so, but he does not necessarily talk for the Republican Party.

Mr. GIFFORD. And so will the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. I shall talk for myself, and the gentleman may talk for himself.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I rose only to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]. I am not intervening in this Republican fight for or against Mr. Willkie. I was simply making some observations.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield any further.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I congratulate the gentleman on his statement about the Atlantic Charter not being very specific. Do not stop with reading the Atlantic Charter, but go on into the British master agreement, section 7, which ties the Atlantic Charter and the lend-lease and the British master agreement all up in one package, and then try to figure it out.

Mr. FISH. All of which shows that there should be a clear expression of our peace aims. Mr. Speaker, I shall not have time to read this article from today's New York Times, but with the permission of the House I shall insert it as a part of my remarks. The article is headed "Economic collapse held near in China," and it is a plea on the part of Madam Koo, wife of the Chinese envoy to Britain. She pleads for speedy help from America. According to her, only 2 percent of our lend-lease materials were sent to China, and less than 1 percent of that arrived. She goes on and answers in detail the statement made by the President about the amount of lend-lease goods getting into China. I hope that every Member will read this statement of hers. She speaks with knowledge, very definite knowledge, of what has reached China. I believe everyone in this House and all Americans are sympathetic with China and admire the Chinese for their long fight against Japanese aggression, and if what she says is true, that the Chinese are near the end of the road of endurance, that they are near collapse, then something ought to be done about it immediately. Where there is a will there is always a way to find a road into China to assure the delivery of more lend-lease supplies—food, airplanes, and munitions of war—without delay. Time is of the essence; we must deliver the goods now.

ECONOMIC COLLAPSE HELD NEAR IN CHINA—MME. KOO, WIFE OF ENVOY TO BRITAIN, PLEADS FOR SPEEDY HELP FROM AMERICA—FOOD AND GUNS ARE ASKED—ONLY 2 PERCENT OF LEND-LEASE SENT EAST, SHE SAYS, AND ONLY QUARTER OF THAT ARRIVES

PHILADELPHIA, February 1.—With nothing more than pitiful assistance arriving from the United States, China is on the verge of economic collapse, Mme. Wellington Koo, the wife of the Chinese Ambassador to Great Britain said today in an address to workers of the United War Chest.

For want of food for her starving people and supplies for her heroic Army, China's ability to resist the Japanese may soon reach the breaking point, Mme. Koo said, adding that realistic examination showed that President Roosevelt's estimate of the aid reaching China from this country was, at least, incomplete.

"President Roosevelt has said that as much is being flown into China as ever went over the Burma Road," Mme. Koo said. "What he did not say was that of all the lend-lease materials China gets only 2 percent, the rest going to England and Russia. What he did not say was that of this pitiful 2 percent only half ever got to Burma and that, of this, only half again ever got into China.

"The President did not point out that of what materials did go to China 100 percent were made up of equipment of war and medical supplies. Not a pound of food ever went over the Burma Road or is going in now.

"While China needs guns, nevertheless the danger of economic collapse is so serious that America cannot long delay to equip and supply China and the Chinese Army, she said.

America cannot, at the same time, long put off financial aid in stabilizing the Chinese currency, Mme. Koo asserted. While loans have been made for that purpose, she declared, it is painfully clear that the import of American credit could not prevent the devaluation of the Chinese dollar as long as there remained an insufficiency of goods for that dollar to buy.

"If China collapses, America will be in a grave spot," Mme. Koo warned. 'If America is in a grave spot, the United Nations may lose the war. Therefore, aid to China must be sent now, at once, without delay. The old saying is still true: 'Divided we fall; united we stand.'"

More dangerous than the Japanese to the cause of the United Nations, she said, "was the relentless pressure of war which makes itself felt in hunger and cold and worthless money, the grinding burden of increasing scarcity and rising prices."

The Chinese, Mme. Koo said, "do not worry much about rationing because there is little or nothing to ration." In the last year prices have gone up not 5, 10 cents, but "in terms like 5 times, 10 times, and 50 times.

"With what money you have, you cannot afford to buy the things which are available and the things you can afford are not available.

"My stepdaughter is in the interior of China, working for the Red Cross. She gets a salary of $50 a month, which is above that of most salaried workers. However, a meal costs her $3, a yard of cloth $10. A one-room hut, made of mud and straw, costs $3,500. A trip by sedan chair, which formerly cost 60 cents, now costs $6. People cannot afford to buy coal, as it costs $1,000 (Chinese) a ton. In Chungking, hotels are asking $50 (Chinese) for a night," Mme. Koo said.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, to this bill there is no objection. It was reported by the Rules Committee unanimously. I believe the bill, as have other naval bills, will speedily pass the House unanimously. Today I rise to call again the attention of the House to the very dangerous policy, or lack of policy, with respect to labor in this Nation during this war. I warn the House of Representatives just what you are up against in the coal industry. Just 2 weeks ago we had a rather disastrous coal strike in the anthracite fields that tied up production and caused much suffering and much dislocation of war production. Mr. John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, has served notice on the Government and on the country that when his contract expires on the 1st day of April he is going to ask for a $2-per-day increase for all the coal miners. I do not know whether the country realizes just what that means, but we have to deal with the coal situation and with Mr. John L. Lewis.

That is the real difficulty. When his contract expires no more coal will be mined until a new contract is made. So that unless the Government accedes to his demand of a $2-a-day increase there is going to be a coal strike, and there is going to be a disastrous coal strike. If the Government does accede to his demand of $2 a day, then you have blown the lid off of the efforts to prevent inflation.

We have what is known as the Little Steel formula for the control of wages. The Little Steel formula provides that there shall be not greater than a 15-percent increase. The coal industry has already had something like twice that amount increase. So that you either must have a coal strike or you must abandon the only anchor you have against inflation, namely, the Little Steel formula.

I mention these things because I think we ought to pay some attention to them. Somebody will say, "Well, let the administration attend to that." I have been trying to get some legislation to correct some of the present labor laws for a long time. We have had some luck in the House, but we have had none in the Senate. However, I do not think we can excuse ourselves by saying we do not agree with what the administration is doing about it. Let us put the blame right where it belongs. What makes possible these conditions? They are made possible by laws that were passed by this Congress. You are not going to be able to go home to your people, neither Democrats nor Republicans, and say, "We are not responsible for this thing. The President should have done so-and-so. The Labor Board should have done so-and-so."

We made those laws. It is our duty to correct the obvious wrong.

Now, take the situation with respect to the 8-hour law, the 40-hour week.

Mr. SADOWSKI. What are the average earnings of these coal miners at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I think it is about $8 a day. I am not sure. But under the coal-mine contract, and I am coming to that now—the question of the 40-hour week—under the John Lewis coal miners' contract the miners are absolutely prohibited from working more than 35 hours a week, and we have on the books our 40-hour-week law. Nobody thinks we can win this war working 40 hours a week. No official in the Government thinks so. All you are getting out of war industries now is forty-two and a fraction hours per week. Yet who is responsible for it? Congress put the law on the books. Is Congress willing to do anything about it? Why do we not proceed to consider these matters, proceed in a democratic way; bring out a bill to the floor of the House? I do not know what the answer is. I do not undertake to say.

I am willing to go along with any reasonable proposal, but a proposal that will stop the waste of manpower that is certainly endangering our productive effort in this war. We all know it. Every administrative officer in the Government will tell you that we must have at least a 48-hour week. Yet we sit here with this restraining law that prevents us from doing a real job that we ought to do, and that the country expects us to do. I wonder if we realize just how grave the situation is going to be in another 6 months on account of the lack of farm labor? We have drained them off to go into the Army; we have drained them off by higher wages in defense industries, until we have reached the point where in this growing season, which begins very soon, the farmer will be so handicapped that it will be utterly and physically impossible for him to raise the food that is necessary for this country, much less for the whole world. And what have we done about the manpower situation? Do you realize that if you take away this restraining influence of the 40-hour week, you would release enough manpower to man those farms? Do you realize how much manpower is lost by these silly union rules, known as the feather-bed rules, that require one man to sit around and look while some other man does a job of work? Count those things up. We talk about having a manpower law. We would not need any manpower law if you would just take away the artificial restraint upon the production of the working men of this country. Take them out from under the heel of the labor leader who is preventing them from working to their full capacity and you will not need a manpower law.

I hope the Congress will begin to give serious consideration to these things. You may blame John Lewis, you may blame Philip Murray, you may blame William Green, but you are putting the blame in the wrong place. John Lewis has been very blunt and frank with the country. He says, "Here is the law. You have given me the right under those laws." All he is doing is availing himself of the weapons that Congress has put into his hands. Let us put the blame where it belongs. It does not belong on the President. It does not belong on the War Labor Board. It does not belong on John L. Lewis or William Green or Philip Murray. It belongs on the Congress of the United States who for 3 years has been on a sit-down strike with reference to doing anything about labor laws.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. My understanding of the Congress of the United States is that it is composed of a Senate and a House of Representatives, so I think the gentleman should be a little more specific as to where the blame rests.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am glad my good friend from Kentucky, who has always supported proper measures of this character, has directed that to my attention. I did say we had luck with those measures in the House. I do not want to make any criticism or animadversions of the other body, but the fact is that this House, on two occasions, by overwhelming votes, has passed corrective labor legislation, only to see it die in another body for lack of action.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I heard with great interest the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] concerning a unified command. We all desire a unified command beyond peradventure of doubt. It is easy to criticize the failure to establish a unified command at this juncture, but we must remember it is difficult to accomplish, for it is complicated by many intricate and diverse factors of which we have no knowledge whatsoever. I query whether we have the right to criticize to the extent that the gentleman from New York did with reference to that failure at this time. I have the highest respect for the knowledge and attainments of the gentleman from New York, but I ask him and other Members to be patient. I am sure this problem is being considered and will be satisfactorily worked out. We have confidence, I am sure, in General MacArthur in the east; we have confidence in General Eisenhower and General Clark in north Africa, and General Marshall, General Arnold, and Admiral Leahy right here. They are in constant touch with the President. We must repose the utmost faith in all these men, because they know what the situation really is and we do not know what the situation really is. They, not we, are going through the baptism of fire. They must be the final arbiters. They will not fail us.

Another matter to which I should like to advert is punishment of the war guilty when peace comes. When one compares the statements and articles appearing in newspapers today with what appeared in the newspapers and periodicals of 1917 and 1918 one finds a distinct parallel. Everybody then asked, everybody now asks, for the setting up of so-called atrocity courts to try the war guilty. What happened then? It is most significant to realize that 900 individuals were scheduled for indictment and punishment, from Kaiser Wilhelm down, following the First World War, but all it resulted in was an international wink of the eye, as it were, a mere mockery. The 900 were whittled down to 70, and then to 60, and finally to 12—and where do you think the 12 were tried? As a result of reservations made by this country and by Japan—think of it!—and England, those 12 culprits were tried before the Supreme Court of Leipsic by Hun judges. It would be equivalent to Hitler, Goering, and Goebbels being tried by a court made up of Gestapo agents. That farce resulted in the trial of 12 men. Six were acquitted, 6 were convicted; 2 naval lieutenants were sentenced to 4 years in jail but contrived to escape; and the others were sentenced to 6 months in jail. Only 4 served any sentences. The Kaiser continued his wood chopping in Holland—in comfortable exile—as the Squire of Doorn. The Dutch Government had refused to recognize the order of extradition. Think of it! We should have no recurrence. The will was there then as the will is here today, but this time we must carry out the good intentions; otherwise we shall make ourselves utterly and woefully ridiculous. We beat the Nazis or Huns once, we will beat them again, but if we fail to punish properly and curb and control these Prussian Junkers this time, they will rise again to smite us. We shall never beat them a third time.

When following the First World War we demanded the setting up of these atrocity courts Theodore Roosevelt said: "Put them behind the bars, put them in padded cells." But nothing came of those high protestations. The time has now arrived when we should blueprint and plot as it were—if I may use that term—the setting up of appropriate tribunals to try these international culprits, these offenders against the laws of God, man, and humanity. If we let it all go until victory shall have been achieved we shall be bogged down with so much bickering as to what type of court, as to what type of material evidence, as to who shall prosecute, as to who shall be the judges, as to the venue of the court, that we shall accomplish nothing. That shall not be. Let us do the spade work now and not wait.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, there being no further requests for time, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1446) to authorize appropriations for the United States Navy for additional ship-repair facilities, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1446) to provide for additional ship-repair facilities, with Mr. DELANEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY], who reported the bill by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall not be interrupted during my presentation of this analysis of the bill for I have endeavored to make a complete statement of every section. After I have completed this exposition I shall be pleased to answer questions; and I may add that I shall have plenty of time in which to do that.

This bill is a bill in general to authorize appropriations for the United States Navy for additional ship repair facilities. Specifically, the appropriation when obtained will be used for the purpose of building floating drydocks sufficiently mobile to use them in places where there are no ship repair facilities at the present time. As the war developed our Navy was called upon to take part in movements far removed from our shores. Then as ships were damaged there were few facilities for repairing same and, in some cases, they had to be brought back from the southern Pacific as far as Pearl Harbor and, of course, even farther to our own docking facilities on the west coast.

This situation was fully studied and considered, and the conclusion was that the need for ship repairing could best be met by building mobile drydocks which could be towed to places nearer the fleet. This study and analysis was made of existing docking facilities throughout the world that would be available to the Allied Nations, and an estimate of the number of ships which could be expected to require docking. Based on this study, it was thought that the best results could be obtained by the use of this appropriation for mobile drydocks alone and in three classes, each one with reference to the types of vessels served by said drydocks. The number of floating drydocks recommended is 48, and the estimated cost is placed at $133,000,000. The equipment and facilities to be used by these drydocks, it is estimated, will cost $77,000,000, making, therefore, a total authorization of $210,000,000.

The bill also provides for the acquisition of land, but there is no intention at this time to acquire any land except within the continental limits of the United States. These drydocks will not be specifically located, for they are movable and will be placed where they are most needed, and their location will depend upon the developments of the war. The committee, however, offered an amendment that the Secretary of the Navy should, within 60 days, transmit to the Congress a full report of all acquisitions of land effected under the authority of this act.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. I notice the gentleman stated there was no intention to purchase any land outside continental United States. The gentleman always knows whereof he speaks, but my understanding was that if we had a base, for instance, somewhere in the world and it was necessary to transport a drydock to that base for the purpose of repairing crippled ships in the vicinity, it might become necessary to acquire sufficient land on shore to establish the equipment which must be used and go with a drydock, if the drydock is to be of service. Am I wrong in my understanding?

Mr. DREWRY. No; the gentleman is entirely correct. There is no intention to acquire land at this time. We do not know what may occur in any theater of war that may later necessitate getting some land at some place to use these mobile drydocks for the repairs to which the gentleman just referred.

Mr. MICHENER. The reason I interrupted the gentleman was that I understood him to leave the impression that this land would be purchased only within continental United States. It seems to me it is vastly more important if we have a drydock that we implement the drydock, whether it requires the purchase of a half acre of land at a base in a foreign country or not.

Mr. DREWRY. I said there was no intention at this time to that effect in this bill. I probably should not have said even within the continental limits. The bill itself provides for the acquisition of land, if necessary, which meets the idea that the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman give the House assurances that this bill does not authorize the acquisition of land for any other purpose than that expressed in the bill; that is, incident to the construction of drydock facilities?

Mr. DREWRY. Yes. That is the statement that was made to the committee, that no acquisition of land as referred to in this bill would be required except in the event of some contingency which we cannot foresee at this time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. May I say to the gentleman that they cannot buy land under this bill for any other purpose except drydock purposes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I think it should be pointed out also that if any land is acquired, the amendment in the bill requires that it report to Congress after 60 days when and where they have acquired it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In that connection I may say that the damage could be done by that time. I want to establish the clear intent of Congress that this bill does not carry with it any authority to acquire land by the Government or the Navy Department other than what may be necessary incident to the construction of the drydocks authorized by the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DREWRY. That is true.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. I confess that I cannot see any place in the bill where there is a limitation to drydocks. The authority granted here, as I see it, is for acquiring essential equipment and facilities, at either public or private plants, for repairing, altering, or converting any vessel operated by the Navy and in connection with the grant of authority for the acquisition of land there is also the authority granted to erect or extend buildings and acquire machinery and equipment. I must confess that it seems to me we have put a fine coat of veneer on this thing if we say this is only for the purpose of getting a drydock, because, under the terms of this bill, the Secretary of the Navy may do anything. True, the representation may have been made before the Rules Committee that the real purpose of this is to acquire the necessary land for the circumstances requiring repairs at certain points during the course of the war, but the language, the latitude that is allowed, in this bill certainly goes far beyond any limitation expressed before the Rules Committee. I would prefer to let my distinguished friend from Virginia continue with the very able presentation that he is making. It was not my intention to interrupt at this point, so I will withdraw my observation presently and address it to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I think it is very pertinent at this time. The intention of the bill is to confine the acquisition of property to that which is connected and related to the operations of these floating drydocks. Of course, I do not consider that the Secretary under this authority could go out and buy land for the purpose of building air fields or building anything except that which is related to a floating drydock. If it can be interpreted that the Secretary could do that, of course, we will be most happy to have a limitation that the acquisition must be confined to the drydock proposition.

Mr. DITTER. I am going to withdraw my present objection, and when my distinguished friend from Georgia amplifies further the purposes of the bill, I will direct my attention to him. I am sorry I interrupted the gentleman.

Mr. DREWRY. In the meantime, let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he read the first section, as follows:

> That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $210,000,000 for essential equipment and facilities at either private or public plants for repairing, altering, or converting any vessel operated by the Navy or being prepared for naval use.

That does not refer to construction.

Mr. DITTER. I have not said that it did refer to construction.

Mr. DREWRY. That does not apply to construction. It applies to the essential equipment and facilities that are needed for these mobile drydocks and nothing else. There is no way that we can tie the hands of the Navy or this Government, if you choose to say so, in this war by making a limitation so rigid that they cannot meet conditions as they arise. This is not peacetime. This is wartime. This bill contains this language because elasticity is needed for the very reason that the mobile drydocks are being constructed.

Mr. DITTER. I will withdraw presently.

Mr. COLE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLE of New York. As a matter of fact, the wording of this bill authorizing the construction of facilities for the repair and alteration of vessels follows two previous authorizations, so that, generally speaking, it is supplemental to authorizations for facilities to repair and alter vessels, but actually it is intended for the construction of drydocks.

Mr. DREWRY. I was coming to that.

With reference to the acquisition of land, the committee has an amendment that the Secretary of the Navy should, within 60 days, transmit to the Congress a full report of all acquisitions of land effected under the authority of this act.

At this point I wish, also, to call to your attention that the bill must necessarily be general and that the location of these drydocks cannot be given out, nor even the names of the places where it is possible they may be located. Such information would be very helpful, of course, to the enemy. All the information, however, concerning every phase of this proposed construction has been given in executive session to the Naval Affairs Committee. The committee unanimously approved the bill and directed me to report it. It has been approved by the Navy Department and has the approval of the Budget and is in keeping with the plan of the military command.

The committee also amended the bill to provide that the title of all construction included in this bill should remain in the United States, and the amendment is in accordance with the act of March 11, 1941.

In order to meet the immediate need, the Navy Department thinks that an authorization for $210,000,000 would be sufficient at this time for the construction of these floating drydocks and the equipment and facilities for repairing, altering, or converting vessels being prepared for naval use.

Three hundred and eighty-five million dollars has already been appropriated for similar purposes, and $347,000,000 has been obligated in contracts made to this time. Further tentative contracts have, however, been made based upon the appropriation asked for in this bill.

The Navy Department recommends enactment of this proposed legislation, and it has been approved by the Bureau of the Budget. The Navy Department advises that the steel requirements for the proposed mobile drydocks has been arranged and correlated with other naval construction in such a way as to keep the total consumption of steel plate in any one month below the present allocations of steel to the Navy Department. The Navy Department thinks that it will be possible to construct these docks without impairing the essential shipbuilding program. If, however, there should be insufficient steel to carry on all these programs, together with the drydock program, the construction of the drydocks will be necessarily suspended for the time being.

The need for the recommended mobile docks is very urgent, and construction should be commenced at the earliest possible date. The construction of these mobile docks will require less time, and will not require the use of vessels needed for other war services. Said docks will be, in the opinion of the Navy Department, the most efficient and satisfactory for all types of vessels which have been damaged. Such mobile drydocks will avoid the difficulties of transportation of men, equipment, and materials from the United States to other locations for permanent docks.

If there are any questions the Committee wish to ask, I shall try to answer them.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Reading the newspapers gives the impression that the Navy is following the policy of trying to outbuild the submarine menace. Was there any testimony before the committee regarding what steps are being taken to stop the submarine attacks?

Mr. DREWRY. Not in regard to this bill. The discussion before the committee on this bill was based on the bill and not on other matters.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. The committee did not go into the submarine question at all?

Mr. DREWRY. Not on this bill. We entered into a discussion of it at other times.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREWRY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLE of New York. I understand that Admiral Horan, Assistant Chief of Operations, is to come before the committee day after tomorrow to discuss the subject of submarine activities.

Mr. DREWRY. That subject has been taken up in a general way but not in connection with this bill, which refers only to mobile drydocks.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the question propounded by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] is a very important one. I want the Committee to understand that under the interpretation I place on the language of section 4 the Secretary of the Navy will not have the authority to acquire land for any purpose unless it is related to the conversion, repair, or building of these floating drydocks. I want this debate to show that, in my opinion, this language does not convey to the Secretary the authority to acquire land for any purpose that is not directly referred to in this bill.

This bill is primarily for the purpose of constructing floating drydocks. There are two kinds of drydocks. One is called a graving drydock, the other a floating drydock. A graving drydock is one that is built in the earth. The ships come into that graving dock and it is filled with water. This bill has reference to floating drydocks, some of which are self-propelled and some of which are towed by tugs. While the floating drydock is in the water, the ship is put into it, then the water is pumped out and the repairs made on the ship.

It may be necessary in certain parts of the country in the construction and operation of these drydocks for the Secretary of the Navy to acquire a very limited area of land. If we did not convey that authority to him and it became necessary for him to acquire such land, he would have to come back here at another time and ask Congress to give him the authority to acquire that land to operate his drydocks. However, there is no intention in this bill to permit the Navy Department to acquire large acreages of land and use them for any purpose other than specifically referred to in this bill.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has rendered an outstanding service in this debate by calling the attention of the committee to the broad interpretation that might be applied to the language of this bill. To be absolutely sure that it is not the intention of the committee that such an interpretation be applied to the bill and that it cannot be applied, I propose to offer an amendment that, on page 2, in line 1, after "purpose", there be inserted "of the authority herein contained."

I am just as much opposed—and the committee is just as much opposed—to giving a blanket authorization without our knowing exactly what is taking place as is the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am frank to say that I and the other members of the committee have been very much disturbed by the fact that the Navy has acquired large tracts of land during the prosecution of this war. So disturbed have I become that I have requested the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE] to introduce in Congress a bill which I have prepared.

I may say in that connection that we in the Committee on Naval Affairs do not know any party lines. The minority will introduce bills and they will be presented to the House by the minority members, just as this bill is being presented by a majority member, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY].

The purpose of that bill is to prohibit the Navy from acquiring any land or spending any money for that purpose until it has been specifically authorized to do so by the Committee on Naval Affairs. In the past we have done a fairly good job of keeping up with what has been going on. In two or three acts we authorized large sums of money to be spent, and when we did so we broke down the items in committee, but, much to our surprise, we later read in the newspapers that the Navy had acquired Mount Vernon Seminary and other properties of whose acquisition we had never dreamed when we made these authorizations.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, for instance, here is a bill which was passed on April 13, 1942—fleet facilities, $4,000,000; aviation facilities, $168,780,000, and other items totaling in all up to eight or nine hundred million dollars. When they appeared before the committee we required them to bring in an itemized statement as to how they expected to spend all that money. Of course, sometimes they change their views down there, and they change their minds, and sometimes they do not follow accurately in their acquisition program which was laid out before the committee, but we are going to do our level best to see that the money that has not been spent, some one hundred fifty million dollars or two hundred million dollars, cannot be spent until they come back to the committee and say, "We propose to spend $25,000,000 to do this or $25,000,000 to do that," and the very purpose of this inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] is a pertinent one, because this Congress must know how this money is being expended, and where it is going to go and for what purpose. Therefore I assure the committee that the intention of our committee was that the acquisition of land here is so clear in connection with the subject matter set forth in this bill, and the Secretary of the Navy would not have the authority to go out and buy land for any purpose, if it had no relation to this bill. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, if the conclusion that I have reached is incorrect, I hope that my friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] will set me straight. As I read section 4 of the bill, it proposes to authorize the leasing by the Federal Government, the Government of the United States, of any ship, boat, barge, or floating drydock to any other nation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, that is not entirely correct. It is to permit the leasing of any vessel under the authorization of the Lend-Lease Act.

Mr. DITTER. To that extent.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes; to that extent.

Mr. DITTER. So that we start with that premise; that is, section No. 4 does not bear relevancy to the authority that is provided in sections 1 and 2. In other words, we are doing a double-barrel job. In sections 1 and 2, we are authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to acquire facilities and land for a certain purpose in connection with the repair and altering of vessels. Then we go over to section 4 and in section 4 we go along an entirely different line, and we say there that any vessel we have, boat, barge, and so on, may be leased by the Government of the United States. I should like to concur with the conclusion reached by my friend from Georgia, but I fail to see how those two divergent purposes can somehow or other by implication be merged into one.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It happens in this way. There is no distinction as to whether a floating drydock is a ship, under the lease-lend bill. Under this act of March 11, 1941, they have authority to lease ships, but the title does not pass out of the Federal Government. When the matter was brought up in the committee it developed that in all probability a great many of those floating drydocks may be used possibly in the Mediterranean or other places, and the question was raised as to who would use them, and it developed that probably our allies might use them, and, therefore, instead of classifying a floating drydock as a ship, making a classification of a floating drydock, we simply said that these ships, floating drydocks and things of that kind referred to in section 4, can be leased, but that the title must remain in the Government of the United States.

Mr. DITTER. I do not want to be understood as being critical of section 4 or the intent and purpose of section 4. I have no criticism of that whatever. The point I raise is that the gentleman from Georgia used section 4 as the means of tying into sections 1 and 2 the thought of a drydock. In sections 1 and 2 there is nothing whatever said with reference to a drydock.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is true.

Mr. DITTER. And then we go on an entirely different tangent with reference to the leasing of these drydocks, and the gentleman as I understood him attempts to tie up the authority under section 4 with the authority under sections 1 and 2. I do not want to be critical of the committee or the purpose. My only hope was that in some way we might limit what I believe the gentleman has already said today, the extension of authority and the abuses of authority.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is right.

Mr. DITTER. That in some instances have been brought to our attention. May I ask this question? Instead of the acquisition of the land, and by the acquisition I believe we contemplate the purchase?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is true.

Mr. DITTER. If extraordinary conditions require the mooring of a drydock at a particular point for repair purposes, have we not certainly reason to expect that it would be at a friendly point, at a point where one of those who are identified with us in this war effort would have ownership or sovereignty, and would it not be reasonable to suppose that in the joint effort we have, that a lease might be made for the temporary purpose of providing that mooring facility rather than this temptation to the abuse of power by granting authority to acquire?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I imagine that in every foreign place where a drydock is used it will be used under lease arrangements, but if it so happens that it cannot be used—I cannot conceive of any foreign country hesitating to lease—but we must have the authority, if it becomes necessary, to step in and buy. But I hope it would not happen, and I do not believe it will happen, and I do not think under the provisions of this bill the Secretary will be justified in acquiring a foot of land, the fee passing to the United States Government. However, I do not want Congress to be in the position of saying, "We are ready to tie up and repair a ship and we have the facilities here, but we have to go back to the House of Representatives and the United States Senate and get a law passed to permit us to acquire a piece of property." It would mean a delay, and to expedite the matter authority to acquire or to lease should be granted. However, I agree with the gentleman and I want the House to understand that your Naval Affairs Committee is most determined to see that this money is used for the purpose for which it is appropriated and that there is no abuse of authority in the latitude we have permitted in the various bills.

I am frank to say that I am apprehensive that they have, in instance after instance, acquired far more land than I would have acquired or probably any other Member of the committee would have acquired.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will my distinguished friend yield further?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Am I to understand, then, and can the House have an understanding as a result of the observations made by the gentleman from Georgia—and those observations were in the nature of an assurance to me, and, of course, I can place every confidence in the assurance that comes from my distinguished friend from Georgia, for I accept them without question whatever—are we to understand that if the Secretary attempts to use this authority and then comes to the Appropriations Committee for the acquisition of land which, in the judgment of the gentleman from Georgia, is beyond the scope of the contemplated authority under this bill, that he will join with me in refusing an appropriation to implement the authority voted in this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, the gentleman from Georgia and the entire Naval Affairs Committee will urge the Appropriations Committee to cut out any appropriation which, in the opinion of the committee, after a hearing, is concluded by the committee to be an abuse of the authority granted here. We are going to cooperate with the gentleman's committee, and by cooperating with the gentleman's committee we will be able to bring about more economies, because, in my opinion at least, from reports that have been submitted to me which have been called for from the Department, there has been entirely too much Navy placed on shore. The Navy is a sea-going organization and not a shore-going organization. I am unalterably opposed to building up a great land and shore Navy. Let it go to the high seas and fight. For that very reason your committee has come here time after time suggesting that these officers who are sitting behind desks in Washington should go to the fleet and their places be taken by some WAVE or by some person beyond the draft age. There has been entirely too much placed on the shore. The place for the Navy is on the high seas.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE. Does the gentleman from Georgia include in that expression of attitude, leaving to the Army, the operation of land-based planes?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Now, do not get me onto that subject because we are not going to try to sit in the Naval Affairs Committee as strategists. We are not going to tell them how to fight the war. All we are trying to do is to see, if possible, that the American people get full value for the money that the Congress appropriates.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. In connection with the abuse of power noted by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER], who is the outstanding advocate of logic and expression and eloquence that I know, my friend from Georgia has in mind, I am sure, the fact that we have to win the war, and that hind thought is always better than forethought?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, yes; we have to win the war, but at the same time——

Mr. DITTER. Now, will my distinguished friend yield right there?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DITTER. The chivalry of the South would certainly not make it possible for him to reject the overture I am about to make to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, when I say that as a blushing bride I almost bow before that very gracious compliment; but the gentleman should always remember that I prefaced my statement, as the gentleman from Georgia will remember, with the declaration that I did not intend to be critical of the committee, nor did I want to obstruct the war effort.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is exactly right.

Mr. DITTER. My friend knows I have cooperated long before the war effort.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has lent valuable aid and assistance in inquiry and by careful investigation of these expenditures, and is not subject to any criticism from my party or anybody else that he is critical. He has only tried to see that the American taxpayer's money is properly spent.

Mr. DITTER. We want the best defense for the money we spend, and the gentleman from Georgia joins me in that attitude.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Now, if there are no further questions, I will yield the floor.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. There have been so many eulogies passed around that it is difficult to find out what this bill is about.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And that has the gentleman from Kentucky somewhat confused, has it not?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes, it has. First, I wish to inquire whether the ships, boats, barges, or floating drydocks mentioned in section 4 are the drydocks and ships provided for in sections 1 and 2?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No. The drydock is—but the ships, boats, and barges are any that belong to the Navy.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. So that under section 4 the Secretary of the Navy can lease or lend to any other nation any ship or boat of the entire United States Navy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is the law today, I may say to the distinguished gentleman, under the Lease-Lend Act; and we only add drydocks in there.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. If that is the law today why should it be in this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Because we wanted to include in it these drydocks, so that title to them would not pass out of the Navy but would remain in the Navy.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But I thought that under lease-lend these things had to be done by direction of the President; here direction is given to the Secretary of the Navy. I want to know why that is done.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This is in accordance with the act of March 11, 1941, the Lend-Lease Act.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. If the gentleman will yield, what I want to know is whether excess land or any land owned by the Navy Department could be transferred to the Army without an act of Congress.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Land can be transferred from the Army to the Navy or from the Navy to the Army by Executive order of the President. That has been done in the past.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. And when under lend-lease a transfer is made of anything between the Army and the Navy there must be a full accounting to the appropriate appropriation; is that correct?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is right. Not long ago we took Moffatt Field in California from the Army. To reimburse the Army we had to buy another field for them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Was I correct in my understanding that the gentleman said in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky that as the law stood at this time the Navy could lend-lease any of these vessels to any nation?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is the law of March 11, 1941.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is it also true that when the Navy does that the crews go with them?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No; the crews do not go with them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. We just let them have the boats and not the men.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Sometime I trust the gentleman will come around to my office. I will let him read something about the merchant marine in which he may be interested.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will be around.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there can be much controversy about this particular bill; it seems to be meritorious and it should be enacted; but it should not suffice to spend hundreds of millions of dollars for the construction of drydocks and munitions of war without making adequate provision for feeding the armed forces and the civilians who must produce the goods with which to carry on this war.

When the price control bill was before Congress, I offered a compromise which was later adopted in principle, which authorized the President to take into consideration farm labor costs in setting maximum prices for farm products. I did this after Secretary Wickard and Price Administrator Henderson had "eaten their words" wherein they had approved 110 percent of parity. The President had threatened to break through even the parity formula of 85 percent, in total disregard of the parity provisions of the Price Control Act.

You will recall that he assumed to have this authority and threatened to use it on October 1 if the Congress had not acted by that time. The suggestion that all farm labor be included in establishing parity would have increased the ceiling to about 112 percent of parity. Needless to say the President would have vetoed any such bill inasmuch as he had objected to 110 percent of parity and would have then issued his Executive order, the authority for which he claims is contained in the War Powers Acts, breaking through not only 110 percent of parity but in some cases announced that he would go as low as 65 percent of parity, this latter statement being borne out by the fact that administrative spokesmen at the time of our conferences advocated that authority for this action be contained in the price control bill.

To me it was a question of salvaging what we could in the hope that the new Congress would correct the situation. I advocated, therefore, the compromise which guaranteed parity and established a floor in respect to ceiling prices, raising the parity formula under A. A. A. from 85 percent to 90 percent. Therefore, we were assured of a ceiling of 100 percent of parity and a floor of 90 percent of parity, which continues for a period of 2 years following the war.

It was represented that the administration would take into consideration the increase in farm labor costs, and to assure an adequate production of farm products would add labor costs to the parity formula in establishing maximum prices. The administration has not done so. In this respect it has broken faith not only with the Congress but with the farmers and all others both in the armed forces and civilian life who had a right to expect that the President, Secretary Wickard, and the O. P. A. Administrator would adjust farm-price ceilings upward to encourage adequate production. We are now faced with the probability of a serious food shortage which is due primarily to the failure of the administration to understand the labor problem confronting our farmers and the necessity for adequate production of farm products as an essential auxiliary to our war effort. An adequate production of food in time of war is as necessary to victory as is a plentiful supply of munitions. Because of the disastrous consequences of the failure of the administration to use the powers granted to it by the Price Control Act to assure an adequate supply of food for our armed forces and civilians, there is but one alternative—the Congress must reassume its responsibility and adopt in principle, at least, the provisions of the Pace bill, H. R. 1408.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER].

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, last week I directed the attention of the House to an impossible situation which was being created in Battle Creek, Mich., because of governmental red tape and conflicting regulations. The impossible situation has now developed and as a result there is no delivery of coal in that city.

The drivers of the retail coal dealers in Battle Creek went on a strike yesterday, bringing about a complete cessation of deliveries.

I would just like to point out again the basic fact facing the city, facing the drivers, and facing the dealers. The outstanding fact in which I am interested is that my people in a cold community cannot get coal, the drivers cannot get the increase in wages which they seek, an increase from 75 cents to $1 per hour. The drivers are caught in a squeeze from two directions. They could not be given an increase under the regulation which freezes wages. Likewise, they could not be given an increase because of the ceiling price on coal which makes it financially impossible for the dealers to give the increase demanded and still operate without going bankrupt.

The dealers are likewise caught in the squeeze because they cannot sell coal without the drivers, and they cannot continue to operate their business, being forbidden to meet the drivers' demands by Government regulations, and being prohibited likewise from meeting the demands because the price at which they sell their product is frozen.

Consequently, Battle Creek, with very low temperatures, is going to be very cold before it gets warmer.

This same situation can, and will, develop in other communities throughout the country. It is a senseless and inexcusable malfunctioning of government.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON].

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to get back to this bill. We should not close this debate without making it clear that the purpose of section 4 is not to allow anything that is not now allowed by law but it was the intention of the Naval Affairs Committee and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE], who first brought it up, that we should limit this Government and the Navy Department from transferring anything to any foreign government whereby the title did not remain in the United States. This is the purpose of section 4.

Secondly, this debate should not close without complimenting the Bureau of Ships, and Yards and Docks on the plan they have for floating drydocks. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is a new floating emphasis on Navy repair facilities.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. DITTER. The gentleman does not mean to convey to the House the impression that we have not had floating drydocks before, does he?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Oh, no; I say that the emphasis is being placed upon a huge program of floating drydocks rather than going into these foreign countries and acquiring land to build something permanent in the way of graving docks or wharves.

Mr. DITTER. We do not like to call them foreign countries, do we? We mean that we are going to avail ourselves of the friendly relationships presently existing between this Government and those that are identified with us in a common purpose. We are going to avail ourselves of facilities that they may have at hand for mooring our floating drydocks.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the necessity may arise when we would have to put one of these floating drydocks in some country that is not technically our ally. It may be a neutral country.

Mr. DITTER. Friendly?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not know. I am somewhat like Churchill who says, "He who is not with us in this fight is against us."

Mr. DITTER. But the gentleman would not imagine for a moment that we would purchase land in a country that presently is under the sovereignty of one of our enemies?

Mr. MAGNUSON. No; not necessarily.

Mr. DITTER. All the rest of the world is our friend.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right.

Mr. DITTER. That is my impression as I think of the magnitude of our relationship in world affairs today.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The purpose of this program is to get away from permanency of drydocks on land beyond the continental limits of the United States. We have restricted the bill so that the title to these drydocks will remain in this country and after the war those drydocks will be ours and can be used by ourselves.

Mr. DITTER. I compliment the gentleman on the caution that he has already exercised, which is due not only to his intelligent approach to the problem but because of his experience with the Navy, and I compliment him.

Mr. COLE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLE of New York. Referring again to section 4 and the limitation contained therein, there are two rather than one; first, that the title shall not be transferred to any foreign power, either for a short period or a long period, and that if a lease is made that lease shall not extend beyond the present war.

Mr. MAGNUSON. For the duration of the war.

Mr. COLE of New York. There are two limitations rather than one.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The idea was originally brought up by the gentleman from New York and the committee entirely agreed with him.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The theory behind the bill, so far as the floating drydocks are concerned, is a very important one from the practical angle in connection with winning the war and involves the proposition of repairs to naval vessels at places other than at land bases or naval stations on land?

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is right, and to get away from what bothers all of us.

Mr. McCORMACK. And answering the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, to satisfy him and to bring a little consolation to him, this bill is considered very important in connection with winning the war?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes. May I say further, when this war broke out we found ourselves in the Pacific, for instance, with no drydock facilities throughout that vast expanse of water with the exception of Pearl Harbor. This type of drydock facility can be used in the Pacific and we hope, of course, we will not have to keep them there long.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAAS. I want to point out this amendment that the committee inserted at its own instance not only applies to this bill but applies to ships of every character, and every ship in which the United States still has title.

Mr. MAGNUSON. In other words, it is the intention of the Naval Affairs Committee of this House that the great Navy we are building will always belong to the United States, that the title of it will be in the United States of America and no other country.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the indulgence, and I do not want to detain the Committee unduly, but, for the benefit of the Committee, I think I should make clear what probably is presently not definitely before us. There might be a misconstruction placed on the statement of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, the majority leader.

We have had floating drydocks before. If I am incorrect in that statement, I should like to be corrected. I repeat, we have had floating drydocks before. May I say to my friend from Massachusetts, the distinguished majority leader, that as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I helped provide appropriations for floating drydocks. We were critical in times past of one mammoth floating drydock. The Navy subsequently withdrew the request for that particular type of floating drydock.

So that, whatever observation was made in connection with my thought on the possible abuse of power, it was in no way critical of the use of floating drydocks or the possibility of them being very necessary during the course of the war. I am thoroughly in accord with that. I feel that mooring facilities should be provided, but I do believe there should be a limitation in some way on the grant of power which is a continuing invitation to possible abuse; and in this position I think I have the support not only of the minority side but of a very substantial part of the majority side, who also recognize the temptation to which I refer.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Under the circumstances we may well afford to let this bill move on and become law, but there is much in what the gentleman has to say. In order to prevent abuse hereafter, I think it would be well to apply the practice of writing the intent of Congress into the legislation that we pass.

Mr. DITTER. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia.

I have already pointed out during the course of the debate that the authority vested in the Secretary of the Navy under the provisions of this bill is not confined to drydocks. He is authorized to acquire lands, and that means purchase lands, erect or extend buildings, acquire machinery and equipment for repairing, altering, or converting any vessel operated by the Navy or being prepared for naval use.

Repeated efforts have been made here on the floor today to leave the impression that the authority extended only to the possible operation of drydocks. Apparently the representation was made before the Rules Committee that the authority was intended to apply only to those instances in which it would be found necessary to obtain mooring facilities for a floating drydock. I believe such facilities might well be necessary and essential to the prosecution of the war. I need not dwell at this time on the position which I have always taken—that nothing should be done to interfere with the war effort. But let it be understood, definitely understood, understood beyond the shadow of a doubt that the Secretary is not authorized to extend further the generous real-estate operations to which resort has already been had.

Few of us realize the magnitude of the real-estate operations already undertaken by the Army and the Navy. In truth Uncle Sam has become the No. 1 realtor. According to the December issue of the Army Officer, "The Army and Navy before war's end will have acquired land equivalent in size to the entire New England group of States." Mark you, not one State, but equivalent to the entire New England group. The same journal is authority for the statement that "To date some 64,368 tracts have been purchased with 57,000 in process of condemnation, or some 12,000,000 acres, representing a value of $284,000,000. The Office of War Information estimates that the land purchased from private property holders equals in size the combined areas of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, the District of Columbia, and four-fifths of New Jersey."

Think for a moment what this means to the problem of local taxation. For the most part these tracts prior to the acquisition by the Government carried their share of the real-estate-tax burden of the community. Others must now take over this burden. The surrounding community must make up the loss. Insofar as these acquisitions are necessary, they should be secured. But care and caution should be the watchword.

We should also be mindful of the future—mindful of that day when curtailments in the instruments of war will be inevitable. What use will be made of some of these extensive and, in many instances, exorbitantly expensive real-estate ventures? I say very seriously today that restraint on the practices already indulged in to make Uncle Sam the No. 1 realtor should be exercised, rather than giving encouragement to further excursions in the same field.

I find it difficult to contemplate any possible condition where mooring facilities for floating drydocks could not be secured by short-term lease agreements. The very idea of a floating drydock suggests a temporary stand rather than a permanent location. The sites will be the property of our friends, not our enemies. Mutuality of purpose would prompt the granting of every possible concession to us. By no stretch of the imagination can I conceive of the need of an unconfined and vagrant grant of authority such as I feel is provided for in the measure before us.

Let it be remembered that the Congress, not the Secretary of the Navy, is answerable to the people. The responsibility is ours. If power which we delegate is abused, the people have the right to ask whether we exercised the caution of reasonably prudent men in making possible the complained-of abuse.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $210,000,000 for essential equipment and facilities at either private or public plants for repairing, altering, or converting any vessel operated by the Navy or being prepared for naval use.

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think I would be derelict in my duty if I did not bring to this committee some information in regard to the proposal that has been presented to the committee. Every dollar of this money has already been contracted for. The contracts have been let to build these drydocks, without a line of authority for it having been enacted into law, and without any consideration of it by the Committee on Appropriations. You are merely called on here today to ratify something that has already been completed and finished. We have been reduced to a rubber stamp.

I think it is about time for us to call the Navy Department and the War Department on the carpet and for the Congress to have something to do with the money they are spending. I do not want to be placed in the position of being opposed to building drydocks but I am opposed to the manner in which this matter has been transacted. The contracts are being let without a line of authority from the Congress, without any consideration by the Committee on Appropriations, and without a line of publicity about who is to get the contracts or how much money is involved in the matter. The contracts are supposed to be on a cost-plus-a-fee basis, which I have opposed for the 4 years that I have been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Such a practice lends itself to all kinds of abuse and to all kinds of favoritism. When the country is bankrupt and we are taxing the shirts off our people back home, it is about time that we looked these matters over very carefully. This Congress has been in continuous session for 2 years. We have had plenty of time to consider any matter the Navy Department has wanted to bring here, but they come up to our committee and say, "This is what we have done. We have let this contract and that contract and we have spent all this money, $210,000,000. Now we want you to honor our cold check." I am opposed to that kind of practice by the Navy Department or any other Department. It is illegal and irregular and breeds waste and extravagance. Now is the time to call a halt.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I invite the attention of the committee to the report that was submitted when the bill was brought to the House. It is true the Navy Department felt the urgent need for these floating drydocks and did obtain from the President of the United States authority to make tentative contracts until the House could get back in session and ratify what had been done.

May I say further that the Committee on Naval Affairs wants the country to know the good news as well as the bad news. There is no hesitancy on the part of this committee at any time to disclose any and all facts.

The report of the committee includes this language:

The need for the recommended mobile docks is very urgent and commencement of construction at the earliest possible date is necessary. In order to expedite such commencement, the Navy Department requested the approval of the President to contract for the entire program, within the estimates herein submitted. This approval was given subject to the condition that the Navy Department could complete the drydock program out of its present assignment of steel without impinging on its essential programs. Arrangements have been made to conform to this condition.

I said, "Put in this report and tell this committee the people with whom you made your contracts." Here in this report are listed all the contracts that have been made.

We are asked today to ratify that which the President authorized the Navy Department to do. If this House should refuse to pass this bill, what would be the result? The Navy Department would automatically cancel these contracts.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is the same situation that confronted the last Congress. We get a bill here, and you can take it or leave it. If you do not take it, you are accused of being disloyal, so you have to vote for it or be referred to as an obstructionist, or worse.

I agree with the gentleman who spoke just before the last speaker left the floor that it is about time that instead of telling what we are going to do next time we have now some real opposition to some of these bills. As the chairman of the committee said, let us know beforehand what they are going to spend the money for. We get nowhere by giving these appropriations for blanket sums under blanket authority, and I will tell you why.

Yesterday I saw a Martin bomber, costing $250,000, wrecked on an airport in the District. There were at least two reasons for the wreck: The pilot came in downwind, and the officer in charge of that field did not have the common sense to get the snow off the runways before using them. That happened on yesterday, and the snow had been on there for 2 or 3 days. Five minutes after that bomber crashed there were three snow plows out there clearing the runways. Why should they not have done it the day before? No one was killed, fortunately. While the men say, "Well, that bomber cost only $250,000," they do say, "There is a bomber we needed across the seas that has gone."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman has probably lost sight of the fact that the reason the snow was not removed is that we cannot get anyone to work over 8 hours.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is one thing the gentleman's committee tried to do last year. Get men to work a full week. If I recall correctly, the gentleman gave me his assurance that he was going to get rid of that condition last year, and I have no doubt that he did all he could.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes, but unfortunately there was nobody behind it except the gentleman and me, and there are 435 Members in the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN. For once in his life the gentleman is mistaken. The people of the United States were back of us, no question about it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. But the people of the United States are not here.

Mr. HOFFMAN. You and I are here and I intend to do all I can to help the gentleman and I know that some of those who opposed the legislation introduced by the gentleman last year are not here. I know that new Members who are here for the first time are anxious to support the kind of legislation we offered last year. But you have the administration here. You have the New Dealers on your back. I realize the load under which you are laboring and I am not criticizing you. You are buried clear out of sight and you cannot help it.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. May I point out to the gentleman that while the snow was not being taken off the runways it had all been removed from the aprons and the roadways around the field, so the people could walk around without getting their feet wet but a bomber could not land.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The driveways were clear, the driveways were dry, but the lanes for the planes to land were covered with snow and ice. I am not talking about something that John Jones told me. I saw it.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I cannot. Gentlemen over here on the right were talking about the 40-hour week as a reason for lack of hours of work. Well, they got those snowplows out there within 5 minutes after the plane went down. Out there they are engaged in making repairs to planes, fighting planes and bombers. There are 168 varieties of planes. They have got it over the Heinz Co., but I understand that they are going to cut down somewhat. They have out there four-hundred-and-twenty-odd Federal employees, all under civil service. They are there to repair airplanes used or to be used by our fighting forces. In January of this year 871 man-days were lost because of absenteeism. Last Saturday, January 30, we had a snowstorm. Too bad. If there was ever in the world a thoughtless, "let George do it" people, some of them are right here in Washington. I notice here that they have not even initiative enough to sweep off their own doorsteps when it snows, to say nothing about the sidewalks. Seventy of these 427 employed at repair work laid off; they did not work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Some time later this week I will discuss this absenteeism which is holding up work on war planes.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and I trust I may have the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]. The gentleman from Michigan said something about absenteeism and I want to say something about that, too. If the gentleman from Michigan and other Members who talk about the 8-hour law will use some of their influence with their committees and bring in a bill and give the Congress an opportunity to pass upon it——

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, I am on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and that committee does not meet.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Is not the gentleman a member of the Committee on Labor?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am on that committee, yes; but I do not count there, and few of the others do—just the chairman, the gentlewoman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI]. They have acted that way, and there you are.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Does the gentleman from Michigan mean to inform the House that he sits on that committee and that he has no influence on the Committee on Labor? Some of the rest of us were hoping that the gentleman from Michigan would accomplish something and do something, now he admits that he is just a mere figurehead on that committee.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Not even that, but if you gentlemen on the majority side would give us some folks who would go along with some of the views that I have we might get somewhere. The gentleman does not find any fault with my reasoning or the things that I advocate—we might get somewhere. The gentleman merely says that I have no vote. Let me vote more than once, and I will fix it all right.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, if I may now have the floor, I have risen to bring to the attention of the committee this afternoon a few words spoken by Eddie Rickenbacker out in Los Angeles on this matter of absenteeism in war-production before the Los Angeles Advertising Club, he said:

> The perpetual slow-down in war industry caused by absenteeism—particularly in the aircraft industry, where it exceeds an average of 10 percent—probably is the most flagrant abuse of your obligation since Pearl Harbor.
> In the Boeing factory alone (where Flying Fortresses are made), the day following Christmas 26 percent of the employees were absentees, and our aviators in those hell holes are crying their eyes out for only a few more.
> In the Douglas plants there was an absenteeism of 11,000 employees the day after Christmas. * * *
> There is no absenteeism in the fox holes in the jungles of the Pacific or the burning sands of Africa, for if attempted there they would get a bayonet in their bellies from their fellow Americans.

I trust this situation will receive the attention of appropriate committees of the House.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. The authority herein granted shall include the authority to acquire lands at such locations as the Secretary of the Navy may deem best suited to the purpose, erect or extend buildings, acquire the necessary machinery and equipment, and shall be in addition to all authority heretofore granted for these purposes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: Page 2, line 1, after the word "purpose", insert "of the authority herein contained."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 5, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Navy from time to time, but not less frequently than every 60 days, shall transmit to the Congress a full report of all acquisitions of land, by lease or otherwise, effected under the authority of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 9, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 4. Hereafter any ship, boat, barge, or floating drydock of the Navy may be leased in accordance with the act approved March 11, 1941 (55 Stat. 31), but not otherwise disposed of, for periods not beyond the termination of the present wars, but title thereto shall remain in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this concludes the reading of the bill. Before the Committee rises under the rule, I announce to the House that this is the first bill passed by the Seventy-eighth Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair Mr. DELANEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration H. R. 1446, authorizing appropriations for the United States Navy for additional ship repair facilities and for other purposes, and pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 87, he reported the same back with sundry amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not the Chair will put them en gross.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE AND STUDY THE PROBLEMS OF SMALL BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 18, Seventy-eighth Congress, the Chair appoints the following Members of the House as members of the Select Committee to Conduct a Study and Investigation of the Problems of Small Business: Messrs. PATMAN (chairman), BULWINKLE, ROBINSON of Utah, KEOGH, JACKSON, HALLECK, LEONARD W. HALL, PLOESER, and STEVENSON.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a letter and a circular.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and include an address delivered by Harrison Spangler of Topeka, Kans., on January 29.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and include an article from Life magazine.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix on pay-as-you-go taxation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

(Mr. FULMER asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Wendell Willkie at Duke University on January 14.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an address given in regard to the situation in Norway with reference to post-war recovery. I am informed this will cost $120. I ask unanimous consent that it may be included in the Appendix notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an address by the Governor of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION REGULATIONS WITH REFERENCE TO THE DRESS INDUSTRY

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, on the 14th of last month I spoke on the question of the Office of Price Administration's dealing with the dress industry in the city of New York. I especially discussed Regulation No. 287, issued by the Office of Price Administration, which had so complicated the needle industry that it was absolutely impossible for the industry to proceed with any action unless they violated the law almost continuously and subjected themselves to penalties and imprisonment.

I stated then, Mr. Speaker, I did not think the persons responsible for order No. 287 knew anything about the industry. I said I did not think they were in the dress business or in the needle business. They were put there because some sponsor had some connections in placing them there. To prove their authority, some of them must have concocted order No. 287, which has at least 1,000 or more features, rules, and regulations which must be complied with before you can actually start sewing a dress. From what I gather it takes longer to comply with some of these rules and regulations than it does to manufacture the dresses.

I have given the matter very careful consideration and from my observation I have every reason to believe that the American people want to comply with the orders of the Office of Price Administration. We are all Americans. We all want to do a job and help our country, whether it is on the farm or in the needle industry or in the milk industry. But the trouble lies with the so-called bureaucratic regulations that are made by someone in the departments.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that if we had protected the price-control bill by passing the Wolcott amendment we could have cut a lot of kinks out of the O. P. A. rulings which have caused so much distress in different parts of the country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That may be so. I have not given the matter any study. But what I wanted to bring to your attention is that the various industries, whether the needle industry, or the dress industry, or the clothing industry, or farming, they are all handicapped by too many unnecessary regulations. Every American wants to obey the law. In fact, after giving the matter some very careful consideration I can see where the trouble lies. Big business was called in when their price regulations were fixed, and their men sat at the council table with the so-called brain trust of the O. P. A. in fixing the code dealing with their industry. So that big business, like the woolen mills and other big mills, are satisfied with the code that was fixed, because they have something to say in the construction and building up of the code of ethics dealing with price control. I do not think the farmers had anybody in there. Other little businessmen had no one in there. The needle industry had no one there. So some cockeyed regulations were concocted by somebody in that industry and it is impossible to conform to those regulations. They have amended the particular order I referred to in my previous speech, since I spoke on the subject last month, but that amendment is more confusing than the original order. In other words, it does not help the people in the industry. I have a little sketch that was prepared for me by someone in the dress business, showing that every little seam in a dress must be reported.

That may be exaggerated but it serves to illustrate his plight. If you put on a sleeve you have got to say what the amount of labor is on it. That is impossible; they all work by piece work or week work, and so by the time they get through with making these reports on 287 and its amendments they might as well turn around and close their shop because it almost eats up all the little profits they make.

What I want to suggest to the Office of Price Administration—and I mean it in all seriousness and for the interest of the country—is that they get to some sound basic understanding. Under the N. R. A., which was held unconstitutional 10 years ago, if you remember, every industry had its own representative present at the time the codes were fixed; every businessman had someone representing him in N. R. A. when a code was agreed to between the manufacturers, or the business people and the administration then in existence. We did not have the present difficulty under N. R. A. with the codes, because everybody had something to say. There is no reason under God's sun why the Price Administrator should not call in the little businessman as well as the big businessman and give him an opportunity to confer with the Bureau representatives and work out some agreeable code by which all this red tape could be avoided and under which they could let them go about their business.

I remember very distinctly how in 1933, when the present administration took office, we sought to reorganize industry by the creation of national recovery codes. We did so in close cooperation with the industries affected. All of us who are old enough to remember the situation 10 years ago know how careful the Government was in not imposing any regulations on industries, but on the contrary the industries were encouraged to send representatives to Washington and after many hearings, discussions, reports in trade organs, and the taking of testimony relating to actual conditions in a given industry, a code was promulgated which was to govern that industry for a given period and which could be revised from time to time in the same manner in which it was created. The revision would be made after hearings and the cooperative activities of all branches of the industry in question. It was always the interests of the industries which were considered, the interests of the men and women who worked in the particular trade or industry. Manufacturers and employees would cooperate in the creation of codes and each code was the product of careful study of the best interests of all the parties concerned.

In the present set-up of the Office of Price Administration nothing of this type is contemplated. True, the Office of Price Administration has singled out certain interests and given them the green light. Some industries are privileged children of the O. P. A. and are permitted to dictate to the O. P. A. and lay down their own rules and regulations and whatever concerns them. On the other hand the dress industry has been at the other end of the line and has not been permitted to utter a word of criticism in regard to its own regulations. Instead of pursuing a uniform plan in having each industry represented in connection with the organization of its production and distribution, it is given to men who have no idea whatsoever about the details of the dress industry to make regulations which this industry must operate under or find itself entirely out of business.

I see no reason why, in view of the experience gained by the Government in connection with the imposition of national recovery codes, the same procedure should not be uniformly applied to all trades and industries, particularly in view of the fact that by doing so it will be much easier to continue where we left off in 1933, instead of starting a new system without any basis or foundation to go on.

I realize the vast task which the O. P. A. has on its hands. I realize that it is not easy to change from a peacetime economy without some mistakes being made along the line. But I do not understand why the O. P. A. should not have utilized previous activities of a similar nature in doing its own work.

I cannot see why after making due allowances for changing conditions, there should not be a constant advisory board attached to the O. P. A. consisting of representatives of the particular industry which should have the duties and responsibilities of cooperating with the O. P. A. in the fixing of prices and rules of production.

The machinery is available if the administrator of the O. P. A. would just take advantage of it. Industry is more than ready and more than willing to work with the administration. No one in industry would object to any reasonable regulation if it were made by someone familiar with the industry and in the best interests of the industry itself.

But industry surely does not wish to be made the football of the O. P. A. by being kicked around by individuals who do not understand the industry, do not know its problems and promulgate regulations which are destructive and do not in any way touch the meat of the situation.

The Office of Price Administration should draw upon the industries for help and assistance, and I am sure that all industries will reply to such a call in the best interests of the country and for the benefit of the public at large.

I am sure the dress industry will not hesitate to send its best talent to the O. P. A. for counsel. Let us not overlook the burden which was placed on many industries by reason of priorities, war contracts, and to the war production which must take preference over peacetime production. But let us not add to the burden of peace industries by having their regulations drawn up by persons unfamiliar with the facts.

This order No. 287 not only affects New York, it affects every great city in the whole country.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. ROWE. Being a new Member, I am interested to know what approach to make in these cases, because many of my people are affected in the same manner as are the gentleman's. What is the gentleman's suggestion? How can we remedy what the gentleman is complaining about?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I would suggest that the Price Administrator immediately withdraw order No. 287 or suspend its operation and give the businessman an opportunity to consult with the personnel of the Administration.

Mr. ROWE. What can we do to formulate the suggestion of which the gentleman speaks, and make it operative in the way he wishes?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I should think that what we are doing now would be judicial notice to the Price Administrator that if he does not correct the abuse of which we complain, we shall have to do something by way of amending the law and take away from the Price Administrator some of the powers we granted him. Others call them bureaucrats; I call them administrators. They have been called all kinds of names, but name calling is no remedy.

Mr. ROWE. If I may make the further suggestion, it does not seem to me to make any difference what we call them. I have learned long since that even though you call a bulldog a rabbit, if he bites you it hurts just the same.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I agree with you. I think it is about time that when we pass laws giving these men power we couple with them some control that would prevent their formulating rules and regulations that result adversely to an industry that affects millions of people—millions of jobs. We ought to be in the position where we could approve or disapprove these so-called regulations that the Administrator makes under the laws we pass and under which we give him power.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I think it would have been well for the country if the gentleman had talked before November 3 as he is talking today. After the horse has been stolen there is not much reason to shut the barn door. The gentleman stood here and voted for everything before November 3. At that time he did not know there was such a word as bureaucracy—before November 3—and his stuff is not going down with me.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Oh, wait a minute. The gentleman's question and his own answer do not mean to be helpful. In my opinion, it is stupid to be spiteful when other people are earnestly trying to solve a difficult and important problem.

Mr. JENSEN. It is.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. All right. I do not yield any further, if that is what the gentleman is driving at—because I voted for it.

Mr. JENSEN. The gentleman voted for everything.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Many times I voted with the gentleman's side, but the gentleman gives me no credit for it. I would vote against anything that I thought was wrong, no matter who sponsored it. Had I known such rules and regulations were going to be promulgated in December or January, I would have voted against the measure myself.

Mr. JENSEN. The gentleman must be very stupid himself.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I hope the gentleman is not going to drag the whole discussion down to the level of his last few remarks.

Mr. JENSEN. If the gentleman did not know it, everybody else did.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is lots the gentleman himself does not know, and he had better get busy and learn a little.

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. GWYNNE. Does not the gentleman believe we really need some permanent legislation to regulate the bureau similar to the Walter-Logan bill that was considered a couple of years ago?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Something should be done to stabilize the situation so that the country and particularly the businessmen affected can find out exactly what the administration is trying to do. We would then be in a much better position, in my opinion, to correct the evils we are complaining about.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. We realize the effect it is having on industry throughout our districts and in deference to the Members of Congress who voted for this legislation originally, as I would see it, it was the intent of the Congress that the O. P. A. and its creation should prevent inflation. Was it the intention of Congress that they should arbitrarily cut the profit of a manufacturer?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; I do not think so. I do not think it was the intention of the Congress, when we voted for that law, to hurt the small, little fellow, or the big fellow. The intention was to control inflation.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. And to maintain a price level?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And to maintain a certain price level.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. Not above a certain figure?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is right, and the regulations fixed by the O. P. A. are not necessary for that purpose.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. This order, as I see it, arbitrarily cuts the profit that is made by the manufacturer without affecting the price?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Absolutely.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. In other words, they have violated the intent of Congress. They have assumed an authority that the Congress never intended?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes. If you want to put it that way, it comes right down to that.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Asked a moment ago about what remedy the gentleman had to suggest, he said, "Repeal Order 287." Is that the number?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I did not say repeal it. My colleague asked me what can be done, and I said that the Administrator should suspend Order 287.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Suspend 287.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Pending further consideration, and give the business people an opportunity to sit in council with the O. P. A. to determine what the right thing to do is, without tying up small industry, as well as large industry.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That might be all right for your needle trade, but here is an order affecting the meat industry and the farm industry telling us how to cut up a steer.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I would be willing to go as far as to do it for any industry, if it does not affect the ceiling price. This simply complicates the matter so much it is impossible to get through it. Order No. 287 does not apply to the meat industry, and I do not know what their problem is. I am in sympathy with any group of people who are burdened with a lot of complicated forms and regulations which are unnecessary to control the price of anything.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman has reached the conclusion, then, that instead of making the situation better they have just muddled it and confused it down there and the situation is worse now than it was before?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Talking about 287, I should say "Yes."

Mr. HOFFMAN. What about these other orders that affect the rest of us?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. You may be right. I think the gentleman has been very keen on his feet right along in asking a lot of questions when I get up to speak, and I am only too glad to yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am seeking information. I should think the gentleman would consider it a compliment when I seek to get the information from the source I do.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There are so many regulations that it is impossible for me at this moment to answer all of the questions.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon if I am pumping at a dry hole, but I did not realize that.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the gentleman is trying to get a laugh out of the House, that is all right with me.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; I am looking for information.

Mr. ROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROWE. I am sincere in my effort to obtain information.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I appreciate that.

Mr. ROWE. I want to get some information of a constructive nature. Do I understand that the gentleman believes that the Office of Price Administration should apply a limitation to control the upward trend of prices, but that they should not go into regulations and orders beyond that?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They should formulate some regulations, but they ought to call in the people representing certain industries to formulate what is known as a code, as they formulated a code during the N. R. A. days. In other words, let us not be arbitrary and let somebody in the Office of Price Administration fix a code for your industry or my industry or this man's industry without first calling in the industry and determining what is the code of ethics on the question of price control.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am interested in what the gentleman has to say, but I have a situation, and I will give a little illustration which I believe will clear up something. The O. P. A. fixes a wholesale price, we will say, on eggs. While the O. P. A. is doing that, and putting a ceiling on eggs, the Department of Agriculture through lend-lease has broken or pierced that price ceiling and is paying the farmers more for eggs than the wholesalers can get, which results in a disruption of the entire marketing system for eggs. Here we have one governmental agency trying to stop inflation and we have another governmental agency piercing the price of eggs and you have chaos in the whole marketing situation.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I think the best solution to the whole problem, whether it is eggs, clothing, or shoes, is for the regulators to be called down here by some committee to determine how they arrive at a particular order and how they issue these orders. In my opinion I do not think the Administrator knows anything about most of these orders.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think the gentleman has hit it on the head there.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Somebody in there is running the show. When it is all prepared they go over to him and he puts his John Hancock on it and that is the law. There is a violation almost every day.

Coming back to my people in New York, there are approximately 500,000 people affected by this order. The manufacturer's hands are tied. He needs 10 lawyers, 80 accountants and I do not know how many bookkeepers to fill out all these forms and then when he complies with the law he is exhausted, he has paid out more money than he will get for a hundred dresses. The same thing applies to shoes and garments and collars. It seems to me that all this is unnecessary. If the Administrator says, "We will fix a ceiling as of March 1, 1941," let him say so.

If he says, "Give us the prices as of a certain month or a certain date," it can all be done on one form, and penalties can be created sufficient to punish anybody who violates that regulation. But when you tell him to take 20 different kinds of main orders and then divide them by four and subdivide them again, and then make out forms along all these lines, it runs to 900 or 1,000 regulations which it is impossible for the ordinary merchant to understand.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Further, they cannot stay in business unless they are at least able to break even on the cost of production.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. On top of that, they are just cutting their price. Congress never intended them to do that when the law was enacted, yet they are doing it and we let them get away with it.

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order to address the House for 25 minutes today. I ask unanimous consent that it be canceled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, in order to assure more efficient prosecution of the war, several standing committees of Congress and other special committees have been investigating and checking various activities of the Government. This is as it should be.

It is an important contribution which Congress can make toward victory. But the speedy victory which we all desire cannot be achieved unless the 12,000,000 men who are to be in the armed services have behind them the united effort of the 120,000,000 Americans who will remain in civilian life.

One of the most important functions for controlling and directing the civilian economy is administered by the Office of Price Administration. Nearly every step in the daily lives of our people is affected by its actions.

A year ago, after extensive hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee, the Seventy-seventh Congress passed the price-control bill. Last autumn, at the request of the President, this legislation was further strengthened.

The administration of this law has been extremely burdensome to the American people. Mistakes have been made; wrong policies have been adopted. Some of this was inevitable, for in the setting up of the necessary control, new fields had to be explored.

Daily we hear criticisms of its administration on the floor of this House. We hear that the O. P. A. is violating the law; that it gives no heed to legislative intent; that it is arbitrary, ruthless, and un-American.

But what are we here in Congress doing about this organization which we have set up? What has our Banking and Currency Committee, which spent months in studying the question and which has jurisdiction over this legislation, done to correct the inevitable mistakes made in pioneering in this new field? What have we done to try to find out where authority has been exceeded; where legislative intent has been deliberately thwarted?

Mr. Speaker, we have done absolutely nothing. After passing this law we have completely washed our hands of the affair, except that when the Executive demanded further legislation it was obediently passed, and then we again washed our hands of it.

Members make speeches of complaint, and we do nothing more than applaud.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think the gentleman is putting his finger on a very, very important question. It so happens it is one I was going to discuss somewhat myself this afternoon. May I ask the gentleman if he does not feel that it would be a proper function of standing committees of the House which have enacted legislation setting up agencies or affecting the work of agencies to act thereafter as agents of the House in continuously seeing whether or not those agencies perform their jobs in accordance with the intent of Congress and in an efficient and proper manner, and report continuously to the Congress about it?

Mr. KEAN. That is exactly what I am going to say in a minute, as the gentleman from California will hear if he listens further to my remarks.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I shall be glad to. If the gentleman will permit, I may say that I have introduced a bill to bring about that very situation.

Mr. KEAN. Is this the proper course for this legislative body? Should we continue to be merely rubber stamps, passing laws which the Executive wants and then forgetting about them? I do not so conceive my responsibility. I want to do my part toward winning the war. I know that the other members of the House are just as willing and anxious to do their part.

The majority party which controls this Congress should allow us to take some action; and, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a resolution providing that the Banking and Currency Committee, or a subcommittee thereof, investigate and study this matter and the other questions connected with the war, which are under its jurisdiction.

There is now no forum by which aggrieved citizens can call attention to mistakes in this legislation and ask for remedial action. They wander around the Halls of Congress telling their troubles to various members of the Banking and Currency Committee, knowing that we wrote the bill, but get nowhere.

We should have hearings, review these complaints and see if we cannot better the legislation. We do not want to hinder the O. P. A. from attaining its objectives. We want to help it. It is our job as Members of Congress to initiate improvements in legislation—not to wait for suggestions from the Executive branch.

Of course I do not feel that we should be continually calling the Price Administrator before our Committee to explain every detail of his actions. He is a busy man. But his subordinates can and should explain their methods and the reasons for them whenever there is general public clamor against certain regulations.

Some of these matters have been looked into by other committees of Congress, but why should this not be done by the Banking and Currency Committee, when it is our job?

Many bills have been introduced to amend portions of this law. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] has introduced a bill which might correct some of the mistakes which have been made. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] has called attention to practices which certainly bear investigation.

I do not say that all criticisms which have been made are justified. Much of what has been done, though painful, was inevitable and necessary, but the best way to prove to the country that this is so is to study and analyze the complaints.

The Office of Price Administration is not the only agency important to the war over which the Banking and Currency Committee has jurisdiction.

We have control of the borrowing power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. One of the questions which should be looked into is the relationship between the R. F. C. and the Board of Economic Warfare.

Today, through legislation approved by the Banking and Currency Committee and passed by Congress, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has authority to borrow money.

In the past, through its board of directors, the R. F. C. has had control of the spending of this money, but a few months ago the Board of Economic Warfare started the practice of having one of the many Government corporations—the United States Commercial Company—enter into contracts and then ask the R. F. C. to carry them out.

And the other day—January 20, 1943—there appeared in the Federal Register an order signed by Vice President WALLACE, as Chairman of the Board of Economic Warfare, effective February 25, 1943, giving to this Board all the authority—I quote:

> For the negotiation, preparation, supervision, and administration of all future imported material contracts financed by either the Defense Supplies Corporation, the Metals Reserve Company, the Defense Plant Corporation, or the United States Commercial Company.

The plan, as I understand it, is for the Board of Economic Warfare to obtain the money for these activities merely by telling the R. F. C. to carry out the contracts which it entered into.

We are thus asked to make money available for one well-established agency, while it is intended that an entirely different agency set up by Presidential decree will direct the spending of this money. What an example of the contempt in which certain new dealers hold our legislative responsibilities. Talk about blank checks, this is potentially one of the biggest we have ever issued.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Was legal authority given for the power to issue the order that was issued by the Vice President, which the gentleman has just quoted?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; it was given under the First War Powers Act, which states that the President is authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary. They interpret that as making possible this action.

Mr. HINSHAW. In other words, by the President's issuing an order authorizing the Vice President to make a redistribution, they can also redistribute the power given by the Congress to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation so as to supply funds in turn to some totally unrelated agencies, or certainly to an agency that does not come under its jurisdiction?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; that is the interpretation that was given me when I called up the Department.

Yesterday a bill was introduced in the House enlarging the borrowing power of the R. F. C. by $5,000,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, we should under no circumstances grant this increase unless we specifically limit the funds which the R. F. C. might be forced to give to the Board of Economic Warfare upon its demand.

Congress must continue to control the purse strings. Money given to the R. F. C. should be controlled by the R. F. C. If the Board of Economic Warfare needs money, Congress can appropriate it; or, if for any reason, it seems advisable for them to continue to obtain their funds from the R. F. C. the maximum amount which can be used for these purposes should be specified and there should be full disclosure—at least to the members of the Banking and Currency Committee—of its activities.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think the new Members should be informed that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation itself loaned $2,500,000,000 to Mr. Hopkins, of the C. W. A. and its successors, and the notes of his organization were carried on the books as assets until 1936, although everybody knew the notes were worthless. They used the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and continued to use it as a method of bypassing the appropriations of Congress. Think of instructing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to give Harry Hopkins $2,500,000,000. It took action by Congress to make them lop it off.

Mr. KEAN. I thank the gentleman. I am inclined to believe that the Board of Economic Warfare has been rendering a fine service; that what it is doing is for the best interest of our Nation. But, Mr. Speaker, should anyone be allowed to spend hundreds of millions of the taxpayers' money without giving some sort of an accounting to Congress?

It has been acknowledged that much of what the Board is doing will result in heavy losses. Its officials should tell us exactly what they have done and what they propose to do. If we do not insist upon this, are we not unfaithful to our trust?

Vice President WALLACE, as Chairman of the Board, might feel that owing to his august position it would be undignified for him to appear before a committee of the House for interrogation. However, having accepted a position to which he is not called by his constitutional duties as Vice President, he should assume the obligations of his job. If he does not wish to appear, we should certainly hear from his subordinates.

It has been the practice of the Democratic leadership, when any member of the minority has questioned the great authority we have given to the R. F. C., to state that this is all right because Jesse Jones would be the Administrator, and we all know that the House has confidence in his integrity and ability.

Republicans have repeatedly stated that it is bad practice to pass any legislation on the theory that it would be administered by any one individual. Were we not right?

The Rubber Reserve Company, which holds our stock of rubber, and the Defense Plant Corporation, which is building synthetic rubber manufacturing plants, are also financed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and were organized through legislation under the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee.

We have had numerous investigations of the rubber situation by many committees of Congress. Certainly I do not think we should have a duplication of their efforts, but is it not peculiar that the committee under whose auspices the corporations dealing with the rubber situation were set up is one of the few which has not investigated the situation?

Many of these Government corporations are of extreme importance. Owing to the method of financing, there is no control of their spending by the Appropriations Committee. Congress should keep a constant check on all agencies financed in this manner.

They are an essential part of our war effort. It is the duty of the Banking and Currency Committee to investigate and study the way they are functioning. If we do not do so, Mr. Speaker, I believe we are neglecting our duty to our country. We should be good soldiers, too.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I want the gentleman to know and I want to state for the RECORD that I am heartily in accord with the gentleman's resolution for the Committee on Banking and Currency or some other committee to make a searching and complete investigation of the Office of Price Administration.

May I ask this question of the gentleman, who is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency? Did Mr. Henderson, or anybody representing his office, ever come before that committee when this question was under consideration and tell you that they were going to set up agencies throughout the United States to enforce rent ceilings, for instance, and that they were going to put hundreds and perhaps thousands of employees on the pay roll and require every person who owned a piece of rental property to file a questionnaire in triplicate with the regional housing authorities?

Mr. KEAN. He certainly did not, but when we asked him about how many employees he would need he said he thought about 20,000, if I recall correctly.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Did the committee or the gentleman himself ever contemplate any such program as that when the act was approved?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly not.

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. I yield to the gentleman from California, my colleague on the committee.

Mr. ROLPH. It has been my privilege and pleasure to serve with the gentleman for the last 2 years on the Committee on Banking and Currency. I commend him for the very faithful and conscientious way he has served on that committee. I further commend him on his idea of having a committee investigate the administration of the acts we pass, and I approve of that idea 100 percent. Incidentally, I have myself introduced a bill providing that the Committee on Banking and Currency investigate the rent-control business from top to bottom.

Mr. KEAN. I thank the gentleman.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROGERS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article from the San Francisco Chronicle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

MYSTIFIED AND IRATE PEOPLE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, people are mystified and irate. They can find neither rhyme nor reason in many of the things that are being done by the President and his administration.

On Thursday last I returned from a week's visit to Minnesota. During the time that I was out there I spoke with many people and listened to their troubles. When I say troubles I mean just that.

There are so many things being done in Washington these days that the people do not understand the need for. There is a general complaint that our manpower, a shortage about which we hear so much, is needlessly wasted in making out Government reports that come to them by the ream and in an endless stream. I saw some of the questionnaires that are being sent to our part of the country and they impressed me as having been prepared by crackpot chair warmers who had nothing else to do but to make nuisances of themselves and to pester the people needlessly. One small businessman told me that fully one-fourth of his time is taken up with filling out Government questionnaires.

At the Minnesota editorial convention, which convened in St. Paul on January 22 and 23, I was told that newspaper offices are being swamped with propaganda matter that has little or no value or interest, but the volume of which is so great that if the editor were to read but a small part it would require his full time. One editor complained to me that it had been necessary for him to place a large unsightly pasteboard carton beside his desk as the old wastebasket simply couldn't hold it all. Yet Washington rations paper.

Farmers complain that they are being urged toward greater and yet greater production but their boys, who are needed on the farms to attain the volume of production asked for, continue to be taken by the draft and by war industries where the going wages average $90 and $100 per week for unskilled labor, with time and one-half for overtime.

To make matters yet worse it is practically impossible for a farmer to purchase machinery or to secure necessary replacement parts. It is almost impossible to get a broken machine part welded.

Then there is bitter criticism of daylight saving in the winter when the small school children have to be awakened, washed, dressed, fed, and sent off to school by lamplight. I was told of one little girl in Minneapolis who was recently run over and killed by a truck while on her way to school before daylight. The people of rural America, especially in the Northern States, fail to see the need or wisdom of daylight saving during the months of January, February, November, and December. To them it is just another New Deal mystery, or should I say innovation, for which there is no discernible need.

The folks back home cannot understand the necessity for the army of taxeaters that continually snoop about the country trying to get something on someone. With taxes as burdensome as they are, and with the alleged shortage in manpower, they figure that these snoopers can be much better utilized in uniform, and at the front where their own sons are.

The folks back home strongly feel that this administration does not trust the American people to do the right thing without compulsion. The letters that I get are as one voice in declaring that the American people are just as patriotic today as they have ever been; that they do not need spying upon. As with one voice they demand to be placed upon their honor in all the war efforts. Such black marketing as may exist should be dealt with in a most severe manner, but the people feel that because there are a few chiseling crooks is no reason why the patriotism and the honesty of the great mass of our people should be questioned and suspected.

In the smaller towns many garage owners, as a result of governmental urging, installed machinery for making parts for planes, guns, and other war equipment. Nearly all of them went into debt to do so upon the assurance that they would be given work that would last for the duration. They naturally thought that they had the inside track on that class of work because they were able to produce cheaper, more efficiently, and make quicker deliveries.

Then, too, in these small towns there is no housing shortage and no labor troubles. They figured that farming this class of work out to the smaller communities would obviate the necessity for much of the tremendous building program in the larger cities, most of which the Government is financing and which will be amortized through reduction in income taxes. Now they find that this work is being taken away from them and centered in the large industrial areas, thereby adding to the confusion, congestion, cost, and uncertainty of production. There is everything to be said in favor of farming out as much as possible of the war production work to the smaller centers. The quality of their output is of the best, as each worker takes a personal pride in his product. The production cost is less in the smaller centers because of the absence of gouging by racketeers. The more war production is spread out the more production is facilitated. If the present policy to centralize production is not reversed, it will prolong the war because of limited production and, at the same time, will bankrupt thousands of small businessmen who, in good faith and through a patriotic desire to help their Government, bought and installed expensive equipment at great cost to themselves. Many believe that the work is taken away from the small communities because they are not unionized and therefore the racketeer does not get any "take" from such activity. I hope that is not true, but I would not be willing to vouch for it, because this is a labor Government.

Then we come to the case of the small-town banker, merchant, and others in that classification. Let me read to you a few letters that have come to my desk. The first will be from the owner of a small business college, and I quote:

Will you do me a personal favor? I know you are a busy man these days, but this is really important. I want you to read a letter that I received from the secretary of our private school war emergency council. It tells the whole story in a nutshell.

From your weekly message in our local newspapers, which I read regularly and agree with 100 percent, I can see that the New Dealers cannot convert you. Nice going, HAROLD, I'm with you 100 percent as I have always been.

May I say just a few words about private schools in my own behalf. I have been in this business since 1915 and still think that we do a darn good job of training office help. We are on the job 365 days of the year, and when business or government wants office help we always have some ready or nearly ready any month of the year.

The only way they will ever get us private schools to quit is through legislation. They will never get us out through honest competition. The private schools started the commercial training program, and now the public and Government schools are trying to take it away from us, just like they are taking many other things away from private business.

I next read you two letters from small-town bankers:

It has just come to our attention that the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation will have a local set-up and make loans to farmers under the subterfuge of working to increase production by farmers. We understand that it will be just another set-up in direct competition with our business. This apparently is Claude R. Wickard's baby, as we find a statement where this organization states they plan to loan between two hundred and two hundred and fifty million dollars through the above organization. The Government is so strongly incorporated in a competitive banking business that we are beginning to see red.

We have the local Production Credit Association with main offices here. At the time this set-up was started it was to operate in areas where bank credit was not available to the farming population. I think you will find, however, that these associations are established in county-seat towns where banking facilities are available and credit readily extended. Although they make some outside loans their main loans naturally are in the immediate area of the association headquarters. Production Credit Association receives a Government subsidy of $2,600 for paying overhead which together with their preferred position in being tax exempt permits them to lower the interest rate. On this unfair basis they make loans on the same basis and in direct competition with us.

We also have a Farm Security office whose function it was to loan to individuals unable to get bank loans and place them on a self-sustaining basis. If these principles had been adhered to it would have some merit, but they also overstep and make loans in direct competition with us.

We have a seed-loan office here making loans to farmers, most of whom could get their requirements at local banks.

On top of all this the regional Agricultural Credit Corporation with their new set-up is now stepping in to be in competition with local banks as well as other governmental loaning agencies. We are fully aware that the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation served a good turn during the depression as far as banks were concerned. Over a period of years we understood that this concern was liquidated and have helped them in this regard by taking over many of their loans as we were under the impression that this agency would be discontinued and the money returned to the Government. We are sure that none of these governmental agencies are self-supporting and in our opinion have outlived their usefulness if any ever existed outside of political reasons. Would it not be better to have the losses entailed by these organizations stopped and their capital returned to the Government to somewhat alleviate the constant need for money in the war effort?

A short time ago all salaries in private industry were frozen but all of these Federal agencies received an increase of salaries at about the same time, in spite of the fact that their salaries prior to the raise were much higher than ordinary business could afford to pay.

Our local newspapers are getting advertising releases from these governmental agencies constantly requesting free publication to further their loan activities. We are enclosing herein a copy of our recent published statement and we wish to call your attention to our investment in United States bonds of $461,900 and since that time we have added $100,000 to this account. We are mentioning this so that you will see that we are cooperating in every way possible to help the war effort. You will also note that we had cash on hand of $1,100,000 which we are certainly willing to loan. We are also enclosing herein copies of several "ads" run the past few weeks encouraging loans for production and there are more in this series to follow.

We have been actively engaged in selling War bonds ever since they were available and we are constantly striving to further increase the sales. As you know, we have to buy our own supplies and furnish our own time in so doing without any remuneration, all of which we are glad to do, but at the same time, when you face Government competition, with all of its unfairness, such as we encounter, it does not create good will.

During 1942 we paid over $7,000 in taxes, in which is included $1,700 Federal income taxes. We are unable to understand why the Government wants to set up tax-exempt loaning institutions and at the same time expect larger income from tax returns. If Government loaning agencies were eliminated, local bank earnings would increase proportionately and would mean more revenue for the Government.

We favor competition, but I think that you will readily agree that it should be set up on a comparable basis and pay its own way as private industry has to do. We do not subscribe to the apparent Government policy of having banks just as service station for the Government in selling War bonds, doing ration banking, and giving assistance in filling out Federal income-tax returns.

We are sure that hardly any of these governmental agencies are self-supporting and, inasmuch as there is no need for their existence, this waste of money should be eliminated, and taken throughout the Nation, it certainly must amount to a very sizable sum. If this were done and the capital of these organizations returned to the Government, perhaps our national financial structure would be somewhat improved. It appears to us that it would be only fair for the Government to set some kind of example on curtailing national expenses and be somewhat comparable to the individual who has to cut every corner and watch every step in order to buy a few more bonds and pay income taxes. We still have another governmental competitor, which is the Postal Savings System. They pay a return of 2 percent interest, which again is in direct competition with us. It would seem that if this organization must remain in existence, the least it could do would be to lower the rate of interest return in line with current returns on short Government bonds.

Perhaps we, of the small town in the backwoods, are out of step with the flagrant Government socialist policy which has sprung up around us and now furthered under the guise of the war effort. If this is the case, we do not expect any cooperation. We do hope, however, that there is still a semblance of Americanism left smoldering which might be fanned into a flame and that recognition might again be given to individual efforts and business be allowed to exist the American way we used to know and enjoy.

You will please pardon the length of this letter, but these matters have just been piling up, one on top of the other, until they finally reached the point where they had to be expressed. You may be sure that we will appreciate your effort in trying to correct this situation and if you wish us to supply any details or further information regarding these operations we certainly shall be glad to do so.

Let me read excerpts from the second letter:

Agricultural credit companies view with alarm the return of more Government subsidized loaning agencies to go in competition with privately owned banks and credit companies who are able to stand on their own feet and pay taxes which in part must go to keep our Government competitors in business.

What earthly excuse is there for the return to the loaning field of the R. A. A. C.? What excuse is there for Government subsidized production credit associations in which the Government has millions of dollars invested and without which only about one in eight of the production credit associations could operate, even though they pay no taxes?

In our own case our taxes for 1942 amounted to something over $2,400, or $200 per month, while our competitor engaged in the same line of business paid no taxes. We furnish our own capital with no help from the Government and we do not ask our borrowers to contribute 5 percent of their loan for stock on which they receive no interest return.

We are not only up against a Government-subsidized competitor, but in many cases subjected to unfair competition in that production credit associations have solicited our loans and pressure has been brought to bear on borrowers to change their loans to the Government agency. Practically all Government loaning agencies are instructed to turn loans such as we handle to a production credit association set-up.

Private banks and credit companies throughout this State are fully capable of taking care of every legitimate farm chattel loan. We ourselves had a turn-over in loans of about $1,000,000 in 1942 and have something over a half million in loans on our books at the present time to some 700 farmer borrowers, and we as well as other credit companies and banks could handle every loan now carried by R. A. A. C. and production credit associations, if such loans were considered good, bankable paper. The production credit associations and R. A. A. C., with their Government assistance, take some chances that we as private credit companies could not and would not take; however, there is another Government agency (the Farm Security Administration) that could take care of the shady ones.

As secretary of the Seventh District Association of Agricultural Credit Companies (Minnesota, North Dakota, and Wisconsin) I am fully aware that our membership, composed entirely of privately capitalized companies, is very much worried at the continued encroachment of Government into our line of business.

The foregoing is only my personal opinion. However, I know that I voice the sentiment of every agricultural company and bank and they all feel that something should be done to head off any further invasion of their rights to operate their business on which instead of the Government paying them, they pay thousands of dollars to the Government. Something should be done now to head off these Government subsidies.

Any help or suggestions that you may give that would help to eliminate these gross inequalities will be greatly appreciated.

Think of it. They are being taxed to keep their competitors in business. Who but a "damphool" new dealer would ever conceive such a thing?

This is what a small town merchant writes me:

I cannot make head or tail of the Price Administration. Weeks ahead they announce a pending shortage of a certain commodity and tell us that it is only a question of time until it must be rationed. Then the profiteers and hoarders rush in and buy up the visible stock thereby exhausting the supply and increasing the cost if and when it can be purchased. Where do all of these screwballs come from?

Now I want to read you from another businessman who wrote both Senator Shipstead and myself. This letter has to do with the way the Government is confiscating tires. I use the word "confiscating" because when a man only receives 40 cents for a tire that has gone less than 10,000 miles it is confiscation. In Minnesota it must exceed $100 before it is classified as grand larceny.

Undoubtedly you gentlemen are besieged with hundreds of letters regarding the same matter I am about to mention. Far be it from me to begrudge the Government anything that I do for it or give to it in order to assist in the prosecution of this war; but I do feel that in some matters one is justified in registering complaints. This has to do with automobile tires released to the Defense Supply Corporation for which the owner was to receive a reasonable price for his surplus tires.

This writer turned in his extra tires last November, four in number, two fairly good tires, good for at least 20,000 miles, one not so good, and one new retread never used. The retread cost the writer $7 for retread and the tire was worth $6 before retread; that is what I was offered for it. My tires had a conservative value of $22. Today I received a statement and check from the treasurer in the sum of $10.70 the statement reads as follows:

|---|---|
| 1 6.00 by 16 | $3.50 |
| 1 6.00 by 16 (scrap) | .20 |
| 1 6.00 by 16 | 6.65 |
| (This is no doubt the retread.) | |
| 1 6.00 by 16 | 3.50 |
| | 13.85 |
| Less appraised cost of repair | 3.15 |
| Net total | 10.70 |

What I would like to know is who gets the graft; certainly any of the tires sent in were worth more than the amount paid for them. The retread had never been used and in itself should have been worth, as I understand it, $8.50. And why in the name of common sense should one be charged for repairs to tires sold as used tires and at used-tire prices. What prompts me to write and bother you with this trifling detail is the complaints, not only my own, but so many others heard everywhere about the same treatment. If all the benefits go to the Government I want to be the last person to complain, but there seems to be something in this tire deal that has a bad odor and if there is any way that you can purify the atmosphere for me I will feel better about it as will thousands of others. Personally, I would much rather have given my tires, bad as I needed them, direct to the Government if the Government needed them and would receive full benefit from them, but to be jipped is another thing. What do you know about this, if anything?

Here is another letter on tires from a hatchery owner:

I have long been one of your admirers and am coming to you with a problem that to me seems serious.

In 1940 I owned a car with 5.50 by 16 tires. I had two tires cut with less than 1,000 miles on them. Tires were cheap, so I put them in the basement and got new ones. In 1941 I got a new car with 6.00 by 16 tires. Then came Pearl Harbor and tire rationing. At that time I was driving about 25,000 miles a year and I visioned myself driving on rims, so I got the two tires from the basement and had them repaired just before the tire ceiling, at a cost of $5.50, and was offered $12 per tire on the spot for them, which I refused on account of wanting them myself. Then came gas rationing and I was obliged to turn them in. I got my check today for 40 cents, the tires marked "scrap."

I realize this letter won't bear much weight and that you alone can't accomplish much, but can't this steal be brought into the open, somehow? I am just like millions of others. I wouldn't mind giving the price of those tires for victory, and I don't care if they tax me for every cent I can make for the duration, but it does get me down to think laws are enacted to force a man to dispose of his property in order to give some individual a chance to resell it at huge profits. Those tires were worth at least $5 or $6 each any place. A citizen here told me he sent in a tire that had never been put on the car and got only 20 cents for it.

I hope this can be stopped because it is reasonable to think that you can never keep the public in a spirit of cooperation by stealing what they have.

I might add that it was necessary for me to recap two of my tires since I turned them in, and it cost me $15.75 for the two and it was an inferior job.

I wonder what those who suffered with Washington at Valley Forge would think, if they could look down upon us. But Congress is not blameless. For 10 years rubber-stamp Congress after rubber-stamp Congress has surrendered power after power to the executive branch.

The following letter is from a woman who writes me that while her letter does not require an answer she does want me to know that she is keeping an eye on Washington. I would suggest to her that she keep the other eye on her pocketbook, if such advice does not come too late:

I just read an article about the point system of rationing and wondered why Franklin Delano Roosevelt has been allowed to bring the country's food supply to such a low ebb.

First, he killed the pigs, then plowed the crops under, then drove farmers from good farm lands and used it to build defense plants when there are thousands of acres of waste land which would have served as well. Two years ago we were asked to not eat cheese because England needed it. Last summer Wisconsin put on a selling campaign to get rid of her surplus cheese and, at least, part of the money came from Washington.

I was in the Brainerd courthouse in December and found Franklin Delano Roosevelt was still giving out thousands of pounds of butter and cheese, cases of milk, pork and beans, etc., to school districts for school lunches. I spoke of this to one of our C. I. teachers and he said, "Yes, C. I. has tubs of butter and hams in the locker." What I saw given to that one school was far more than they could possibly use, and it is too far to a locker. That district didn't need relief, neither does C. I.

Our woman's club in 1936 started serving soup to the grade children at noon and 3 years ago we gave milk during sessions without Government help. The domestic science department in the high school has served meals for years. Why did Franklin Delano Roosevelt step in? Politics. If you multiply this waste and manpower by the number of counties in the United States, what have you?

If we are short of food and are not turning out enough ammunition so China can get some, why draft more men into the Army? Why not leave them where they are and see to it that our boys overseas are well supplied.

This may sound as though I am a sorehead. I'm not. I am as anxious as anyone that we win the war and win it quickly and that is why I have told you things only people in small towns can know. I would like Franklin Delano Roosevelt to practice what he preaches—pay as you go.

The only promise he has kept since he took office is: "You will be taxed and taxed and pay and pay."

Now I want to read you a copy of a letter that is addressed to Hon. J. F. Byrnes, Economic Stabilization Director, by a prominent farm dairy cooperative leader in Minnesota:

In behalf of our 6,500 farmer-members and the war effort, we want to present a problem which we consider one of the most wasteful and unnecessary programs which the Government has fostered.

While dairy products are desperately needed for our Army, Navy, and Allies, one department of the Government is trying to foster a new social experiment whereby all the pupils, teachers, and even janitors in the public schools will have so-called penny milk. This means they will have milk by paying 1 cent per one-half pint bottle while taxpayers of the country will pay the balance of the cost, which in most cases will be about 2 cents per bottle.

Six men came to our office at one time trying to force us to agree that this was a good plan for the Twin Cities when we knew it was not at all necessary. The Twin Cities are on about the same level as other cities in the United States and are using 12 percent more market milk than they were last year. There is work for everybody who can work and the pupils in the St. Paul schools who cannot afford milk have been for years given free milk and this system can continue.

The penny milk plan was designed as a surplus disposal plan and it is no longer needed any more than the distribution of food by the stamp method. With an acute shortage of dairy products, this distribution of milk at the cost of the taxpayers should cease at once. Providing this point: At the present time the relief load in St. Paul is just one-twentieth of what it was at the peak, and authorities report that it has now reached the irreducible minimum. It seems unfair to us that our 6,500 dairymen members, or anyone else, should be asked to take war bonds to help give milk to the children of wealthy people in the schools.

We are writing this not only from the standpoint of the Twin Cities, but here is a national program which is absolutely contrary to the interest of the war effort. It is a new, idealistic, social plan which is not necessary with present employment conditions and with the increased use of milk throughout the United States. The six men who came to our office said that funds had been appropriated for this cause before the war and must be spent.

This plan is opposed by the people in charge of the school milk in St. Paul, by the producers' association and by the head of the Parent-Teacher Association. In spite of all this, it is being forced upon us by every conceivable means and it is difficult to explain the justice of a program of this character under present war conditions.

I do not suppose there could possibly be as much nutriment in milk furnished free by the local authorities as there would be in milk furnished by Washington, but I would like to see the butterfat content of the two kinds of milk analyzed. You know we are learning a lot these times that we never knew before. It was only the other day—and I lived on a farm until I was 23 years old—and it took a New Deal philosopher to disclose to us that there is such a thing as a female steer.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And did you believe it?

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, I read it in the paper.

Members of the House, these are but a few of the many letters along the same line that have come to my desk the past few weeks. You will note that they express grave doubts that all the regimentation to which the people are being subjected is necessary to our war efforts, and until they become convinced to the contrary there will be that lack of full cooperation so necessary to final and complete victory.

If there are any snoopers who want to see the originals of the letters that I have been reading, they are on file in my office; but, before I show them I would remove the signatures.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Briefly.

Mr. HOFFMAN. If the gentleman does not want to show them the signatures on the letters that he has, he can send them over to my office and I will show them the signatures on the letters that I have.

Mr. KNUTSON. But it would not be fair to the gentleman's correspondents, because the administration then would turn all the agencies of the Government on them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, they have already done that down there where I live, and the people do not care anything about it. They welcome them.

Mr. KNUTSON. Then they probably have kept their shotguns.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Not only that, but they have some basswood clubs and some neck yokes.

Mr. KNUTSON. How about rope?

The country is getting sick and tired; yes, Mr. Speaker, the American people are becoming indignant and outraged over some of the things that are being done to them in the name of emergencies and the war. If the President and his advisers are as smart as I think they are they will take to heart the special election that was held in the Sixth Congressional District of Missouri on January 12. Since the Civil War, that section of Missouri has been almost solidly Democratic. Two years ago our late colleague, Phil Bennett, as a candidate on the Republican ticket, carried the district by less than 5,000. Last fall he was reelected by nearly 10,000. Within a month after his reelection Mr. Bennett passed to his reward and his son MARION was given the Republican nomination for the vacancy and on January 12 he was elected by a majority of 15,000. He carried every county in the district. That has been an almost solid Democratic part of Missouri but like so many other sections of America, the Democrats down there differentiate between the Democratic Party and the New Deal Party. The voters in all northern States did likewise last November.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield—what about Mr. WALLACE?

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, what about Mr. WALLACE? I yield. The gentleman always wants to bring up contentious subjects. Go ahead. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. WALLACE is your Vice President. Does not the gentleman know that Mr. WALLACE said that only the wealthy voted at that election?

Mr. KNUTSON. Then that shows a wonderful increase in prosperity, but I am not a psychiatrist, and therefore cannot analyze the line of Mr. WALLACE'S reasoning.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come for all Americans who believe in and revere American institutions, the American form of government and the American way of life, regardless of past affiliations, to join together for the preservation of the America that we love and cherish.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Butte Daily Post.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIKES). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next, after the conclusion of the legislative business and other special orders, I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, at the conclusion of other business, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

PACIFIC WAR COUNCIL

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I have two subjects which I wish to discuss in these 15 minutes. The first one has to do with the Pacific war.

I think that all thoughtful people will admire the intrepid courage of the President of the United States in his flight to and from Africa for the Casablanca conference. I would like to point out that it is impossible for us to know at this point the full results that those conferences may bring forth. I am confident that the result of those conferences has been to bind together more closely the British and American forces and, I earnestly hope and believe, to bring forth action in the near future which will bring closer the winning of the war.

I do not believe it is the job of Members of Congress to attempt to influence military decisions, nor to demand impossible action just so as to make the record for themselves. But I do think there are certain broad outlines of policy which are the business of every American and certainly of every Member of Congress. My remarks today are made from the point of view of a Pacific coast Member of this House. It seems to me it was unfortunate that the conference at Casablanca could not have included representatives of all the United Nations. I do not know why it could not. I have no doubt the reasons were good and sufficient, but because it did not I want to second with great earnestness the suggestion made by my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO], the other day, in which he set forth a proposal that as soon as it can be done, there be established an Atlantic war council composed of representatives of Britain, the United States, and Russia, and a Pacific war council composed of representatives of Britain, the United States, and China. It is about that relationship existing in the Pacific theater of war that I want to say a few more things.

China is the one nation that has struggled longest against the aggression of the Axis Powers. She has been at war for 6 long years, and she has been at war for very little to go on. No one can fail to realize the tremendous difficulty involved in getting substantial military aid to China at the present time, nor would any sensible or thoughtful Member of Congress ask that the impossible be accomplished.

I think, however, it is not out of place for a Member of Congress to urge that every possible effort be made to arm to the best possible extent the millions of Chinese who have fought so courageously for so long. My reason is this, that if Japan is to be conquered in what people far wiser than myself have indicated is the surest way—namely, by an attack upon Japan herself—obviously the matter of preventing Japan from consolidating herself on the continent of Asia becomes of tremendous importance. The manpower of China is almost unlimited. The extent to which she can be taken into full partnership in this effort, as I am confident we are going to do, and the extent to which material aid can be sent to her, may determine the possibility of preventing Japan from so consolidating her position.

Furthermore, this is not only a military war, but a moral war as well. It is a war between two opposing philosophies of life and government around the world. Japan has made the specious and false claim that she represents by her armies the cause of all the non-Caucasian peoples of the world. She is wrong. She represents the cause of tyrannical government. The way that the United States can answer that false claim on the part of Japan better than in any other way is by the building up of relationships with the Chinese people and their nation.

May I point out that in the long run the friendship of that most populous people on the Asiatic Continent, one with some of the greatest potentialities of any people in the world, will be of priceless value to the people of the United States.

I submit these ideas, these appeals, if you want to call them that, with no thought in the world of attempting to unduly influence the military strategy of our command. But, as I said before, I think there are matters of deep, broad policy which may be quite as important in this connection, even as military aid to China.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 60

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the second place I want to speak about the position of the Congress and the job that the Congress, in my judgment, has to do in this session. There are certain problems with which we are confronted. We hear speech after speech on the floor in which Members appeal that the Congress should assume its full and proper place as a coordinate branch of government. For my part, I am in hearty accord with that statement. But too often those speeches end with simply a cry of that sort. That is not enough; we have got to know how we can accomplish that. Many of us have read of proposals for the strengthening of Congress or how it can build up its own position. It seems to me that if we analyze the situation we shall find that Congress has two duties. I want to read from House Resolution 60, which I introduced on January 19, for those two duties are set forth therein. I read from the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it is a responsibility of the Congress in time of war to provide such emergency and extraordinary powers to executive agencies as may be necessary for an effective prosecution of the war; and

Whereas it therefore becomes a corresponding responsibility of the Congress to see that such powers are exercised in accordance with the intent of Congress, and that they are neither abused nor exercised in an arbitrary fashion; and

Whereas it is at all times desirable that Congress be continually informed concerning the functioning of governmental departments and agencies which execute the laws passed by Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That any standing committee of the House of Representatives, which has reported to the House legislation which has resulted in the creation of an executive agency of the Government for the accomplishment of certain purposes connected with the war effort or for any other purposes, is hereby designated as an agent of the House to carry on a continuing review of the work of such agency to determine whether or not such agency is carrying on its work in accordance with the intent of Congress, whether the powers granted to such agency are being used in an efficient, effective, and proper manner, whether any amendments to the legislation in question are necessary or desirable, and to report its findings periodically to the House of Representatives.

SEC. 2. In the case of war agencies set up by Executive order and in the case of any other departments or agencies of the executive department of government not covered by the provisions of section 1 of this resolution, the Speaker of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to designate such standing committees as may in his judgment be most appropriate to carry on a continuing review of the work of such agencies for the purposes and under the conditions set forth in the preceding section of this resolution.

SEC. 3. It is hereby declared to be the purpose of the House of Representatives in enacting this resolution that the work provided for herein be carried on in such fashion as, (1) to promote cooperation between the legislative and executive branches of government; (2) to avoid unnecessary confusion, friction, or misunderstanding between the people and their Government; and (3) to in no way retard and in every possible way to advance the war effort of the United States.

This resolution, as will be seen, states that in the case of an agency established by Executive order, or agencies which do not fall easily within the category of the work of one committee, that the Speaker shall have the power and the duty to designate standing committees to carry on this type of work.

In other words, the Congress has two duties, not one; one is to enact legislation; the other is to see that that legislation is carried out in accordance with the intent of Congress. How can it do it? By setting up innumerable special committees? By waiting until there is difficulty in connection with the administration of a law and then having a special resolution brought in for a special committee with an ex parte hearing on the floor about all the things that are wrong with an agency and then going into it in that manner? Or would it not be far, far better to strengthen the position of the standing committees of the House by giving them continuously this investigating function and saying that we are not going to wait until there is difficulty but that we are going to have in the standing committees of the House a continuing means and a recognized constant duty to see to it that the laws they pass are carried out as was intended by this House.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. In just a minute.

Furthermore, the suggestion that has been made that committees of the House equip themselves with additional staffs for the purpose of carrying on their work more effectively would be very largely met by this proposal, because I think it would be inevitable that if the committees were as active as I think they would be under these circumstances they would naturally acquire such staffs as they might need; and I might say further that I have many times felt as I sat on committees of the House that it was too bad that in order to get accurate information about the problems that we had in hand the only way we could do it was to go to an executive agency and ask for the information.

I have wished many times we might have at our command such assistance as to be able to develop our own philosophy, and more especially to have access to facts and information about the problems we face, which we then might compare with the views of the departments carrying on the important and necessary work.

Mr. Speaker, it is not of any use for us simply to complain about things that may be not perfect or may in some cases be very bad in connection with the huge and complex war effort of this Nation. I say again today, as I have said many times in this House, we cannot possibly organize a great democratic people to fight a total war and have everything work out nearly as well as we would like to have it work out. Our job is to be critical when criticism is necessary, but to advance constructive proposals for the solution of these problems at the same time we criticize.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a newspaper column by Mr. Will Blair, from the Pasadena Post, commenting on this measure which I have introduced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, is not the gentleman advocating a procedure similar to that advocated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]; and if not, in what does it differ?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. My proposal, so far as I know, contained in this resolution has not been advanced by anybody except in cases like the resolution spoken of here today by the gentleman from New Jersey and introduced by him to have the Committee on Banking and Currency investigate the work of the Office of Price Administration. That is precisely along the lines I am talking about here except my resolution would take care of the matter once and for all and would say that any standing committee at any time and continuously would have not only the right but the duty to perform this investigative function of the Congress.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Did not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] advance that same proposition some time ago, that the Congress employ experts to assist it?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Oh, that is right, but I am not talking primarily about employing experts. That is a different proposal. I am talking about having the standing committees exercise not only the function of passing laws but the corresponding function of seeing that the laws are carried out in connection with the intent of Congress.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman realize that when you are on a standing committee you go to the executive department for information, as the gentleman just stated?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is the procedure. Naturally they have their views and the interest of their own department and as we go along and the longer we are here we become acquainted more or less with them and we become reliant upon what they have to say. Does not the gentleman see how we become a sort of an errand boy for them?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The gentleman is injecting things here.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am not injecting anything. I am asking the gentleman something.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. My whole speech is the answer to the gentleman's question. Of course, I cannot conceive of the gentleman from Michigan becoming dependent upon any executive agency or department.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I may not believe anything they say, but I have no other figures except what they give me.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Exactly. And that is one of the situations I am trying to correct. I may say to the gentleman my proposal is intended to cure that situation.

Mr. HOFFMAN. May I say to the gentleman from California that I am an off-sheep in that way, but I do not think all the Members of this House are so lacking in determination or common sense that they do not follow their own conclusions.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think most of them follow their own conclusions, may I say to the gentleman.

The editorial to which I referred follows:

THE LOOKOUT

CONGRESS CAN FIND PLACE IN IMPROVING WAR EFFORT

Congressman JERRY VOORHIS, of California, has made what, at this distance, appears to be an excellent proposal as to what Congress may do in regard to the administrative agencies engaged in the war effort on the home front.

Results of the November election generally are interpreted to mean that the public is dissatisfied with what may be termed "the business management of the war." There is little disposition on the part of the public or of Congress to interfere in military policies, but there is a decided feeling that both Congress and the public should hold the administration to more strict accountability in its handling of human and economic problems.

Proposals heretofore discussed among congressional leaders have been for the formation of a general investigating committee to study, to expose abuses, and to make proposals for avoiding clashes of authority, duplication of effort, and unsound interpretations of policy. The hope would be to bring order and legal sanctions into a scene marked by extemporization and personalism.

The aim is commendable and its achievement would be of the utmost value in the prosecution of the war.

But many persons who have followed the work of congressional investigating committees know that such committees, in general, have followed destructive courses. They are all right, perhaps, in matters which can be deal with by wholesale destruction and slow rebuilding. There is no time for such a process in reforming the war agencies. If Congress wants to be helpful, it must offer immediate suggestions and immediate legislation rather than sensational exposures.

Mr. VOORHIS has prepared and submitted to Congress a resolution which seems to meet these and other objections. This resolution, in Mr. VOORHIS' own words, "would empower the standing committees of the House to carry on a continuing review of the work of any agencies of the Government set up by legislation originating with that committee, and, in the case of agencies set up by Executive order of the President, would authorize the Speaker of the House to designate standing committees most nearly connected with the work of the executive agencies to conduct a like continuing review of their work."

"The idea behind this resolution," Mr. VOORHIS continues, "is that it is not only the duty of Congress to provide funds for the prosecution of the war and to grant necessary powers for the organization of our economic effort, but also to see that the powers of governmental agencies are exercised in accordance with the intent of Congress, are not abused or used arbitrarily. Had a measure of this kind been in effect, it is my firm conviction that some of the confusion and mistakes which have accompanied some of the programs in the past year would have been avoided. I feel it is preferable to the use of special committees because the work could be conducted with less fanfare and would furthermore in all cases be in the hands of people who would already be familiar with the problems to be dealt with."

Some such plan as this must eventually become a part of the ordinary process of legislation and administration at Washington. One of the weakest links in the Federal Government is the link between the President and Congress. It should be strengthened, not necessarily to strengthen Congress or to weaken the President, but to strengthen Government.—W. L. B.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to put into the RECORD some more figures having to do with the work or the slackening up of work at the airport where the fighting planes are repaired for the use of both the Army and the Navy; in fact, all of the work that comes into this section of the country. That will take too long at this time and I will do it later in the week.

Permit me to call attention at this time to a privileged resolution which I introduced today which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the House of Representatives the answers to the following questions:

1. Does section 1534 of title 10 of the United States Code, among other things, provide that—

"An officer who uses contemptuous or disrespectful words against * * * the Congress of the United States shall be dismissed from the service or suffer such other punishment as a court martial may direct?"

2. Are officers of the Navy subject to the provisions of the section quoted in question No. 1?

3. If they are not, is there any Federal statute or rule or regulation of the Navy of similar import?

4. Section 1567 of title 10 of the United States Code reads:

"Any officer or cadet who is convicted of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman shall be dismissed from the service."

Section 1568 of the same title provides, among other things, that:

"Though not mentioned in these articles * * * all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the military service * * *, of which persons subject to military law may be guilty, shall be taken cognizance of by a general or special or summary court martial, according to the nature and degree of the offense, and punished at the discretion of the court."

Are there any similar provisions of law, or any rule or rules or regulation of the Navy of like import?

5. Does article 8 of chapter 21 of title 34 of the United States Code provide, among other things, that—

"Such punishment as a court martial may adjudge may be inflicted on any person in the Navy * * * who is guilty of profane swearing, falsehood * * * or any other scandalous conduct tending to the destruction of good morals?"

6. In the August 22, 1942, issue of the magazine published under the name of Liberty, is an article by Walter Winchell, which, among other things, charged (p. 54) that one Smith "now indicted, sabotaged the war effort by spreading disunity."

In the September 12, 1942, issue of the same magazine, on page 32, are the following words:

"A correction—

"On page 54 of the August 22 issue of Liberty it was stated that Gerald L. K. Smith had been indicted. This was an error and an injustice to Mr. Smith, against whom no indictment has been returned. We apologize for the error."

which is an admission that Lieutenant Commander Winchell, of the United States Navy, was guilty of a falsehood.

Have any proceedings been taken to inflict upon him the punishment specified in article 8, of chapter 21, of title 34, for the conduct made an offense by the first subdivision of said article?

7. On July 12, 1942, Walter Winchell, while an officer of the United States Navy, asked a radio audience:

"How about the voters going after those other saboteurs who landed in Congress?"

I do not know how many Members present or Members of this body he referred to, but that is what he said.

A few days later he inserted in his column published in the press the following statement:

"Another reason some Congressmen are demanding the eight saboteurs be shot is that they might talk too much."

Congress is a queer place for saboteurs to land. I do not know of any Congressmen who were making talks about it at that time. The Congressmen were keeping quiet about the matter and letting the Department of Justice follow its own course. He stated that "some Congressmen are demanding that the eight saboteurs be shot because they might talk too much."

That was an officer, a lieutenant commander in the Navy, who was saying that.

On July 26, 1942, Walter Winchell, over the radio, made the statement that—

"Nearly everyone who printed seditious articles has been indicted except those who put the same things in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. * * * But, 'honeychile'—all of them will be confronted by the same charges after November 5."

There is a threat. There is a statement that Congressmen put seditious articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If I put seditious articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, why was it that some of the gentlemen on the majority side and why was it that some Members on the minority side, there must be one or two loyal Members in the Congress, did not ask to have them expunged from the RECORD?

Do you realize what this man is doing? He is telling the people of the United States, and he claims to have millions of listeners and readers, that Congressmen, without protest from other Members of Congress and by unanimous consent, are putting seditious articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Just how long are you going to let him get away with that?

My resolution goes on to say:

If the making of such statements was "scandalous conduct tending to the destruction of good morale," what, if any, action has been taken by the Navy or any officer thereof to either punish the said Walter Winchell for the making of such statements, or to put an end to the making of such statements?

8. (a) During the month of January 1943 was Walter Winchell an officer in the United States Navy? And, if he was, what was his rank?

(b) If Walter Winchell was an officer in the United States Navy during January 1943, did he, on January 31, 1943, in a radio broadcast, or in his column as printed, in substance refer to American citizens who voted for certain Representatives in Congress as "damned fools who voted for them"?

9. What was the official position of Walter Winchell in the United States Navy during each of the months of 1941 and 1942?

10. During each of said months, what was his official designation and what, if any, rank did he hold in the United States Navy?

11. To what duties in the continental United States was Walter Winchell assigned by the Navy, and what portion of his time did he spend in the service of the United States Navy during each of the months of 1941 and 1942?

The point of the whole thing is this: We have a law against sedition. Sedition is the utterance or the publication or the circulation of any statement which tends to influence a soldier or a man in the armed forces to do less than he otherwise would toward the winning of the war.

Can you imagine anything that would discourage our people more than to hear over the radio, as they did last Sunday night, from an officer of the United States Navy, a lieutenant commander, that some 14,000,000 of our citizens were damn fools?

I am asking the Secretary of the Navy and I want to know whether this officer in the Navy is to be permitted to continue on the air not only to slander and vilify individual Congressmen but the Congress as a whole, the Congress as a branch of the Government, and is he to be permitted to go further than that and refer to 14,000,000 citizens who voted the Republican ticket, Democrats and Republicans who believe in this country and its institutions, and who are making every sacrifice asked of them—is he to be permitted to go on and over the air designate those 14,000,000 people as damn fools? If he is, and if the Navy will do nothing about it, will the Congress do anything about it?

I have asked members of the Committee on Naval Affairs what they were going to do about it. One of them told me, "I cannot say anything because the things we were told were told us in executive session and our hands are tied and our lips are sealed."

Since when has it been thought lawful to gag Congress when Congress itself is assailed and its loyalty challenged, and when the people who sent us here are referred to as damn fools? It is bad enough to charge an individual Member of Congress with disloyalty or lack of patriotism; it is bad enough to charge the whole Congress with being incompetent or disloyal to the interests of the country, but what glad news it must be to Hitler to learn from New York, the largest city in our country, over the radio which carries the words to millions of people thoughout our country, that a man, an officer in the Navy, can charge 14,000,000 American citizens with being damn fools.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.)

the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 3, 1943, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

The Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation will meet at 10:30 a. m. Wednesday, February 3, 1943, in room 356, House Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 10 a. m. Wednesday, February 3, 1943. Business to be considered: Hearing on H. R. 1012, "To amend the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as amended, and for other purposes."

There will be a meeting of a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 10 a. m. Friday, February 5, 1943. Business to be considered: Hearing on H. R. 649, "For the organization and functions of the Public Health Service."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. SABATH: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 69. Resolution authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to conduct studies and examinations of executive agencies to assist it in the determination of matters within its jurisdiction; without amendment (Rept. No. 81). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. LUDLOW: Committee on Appropriations. H. R. 1648. A bill making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept No. 87). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FULMER: Committee on Agriculture. H. R. 1605. A bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with respect to farm-acreage allotments, the farm marketing excess of wheat, the use of excess corn as silage for feed to livestock on the farm, to provide for the adequate supply of peanuts for oil and other uses, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 88). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. McGEHEE: Committee on Claims. H. R. 1539. A bill for the relief of Master Gunnery Sgt. Eugene M. Martin, United States Marine Corps; without amendment (Rept. No. 82). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. McGEHEE: Committee on Claims. H. R. 1540. A bill for the relief of Capt. Richard Rothwell, United States Marine Corps; without amendment (Rept. No. 83). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. McGEHEE: Committee on Claims. H. R. 1582. A bill for the relief of the estate of Dr. David O. Clements, deceased; without amendment (Rept. No. 84). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. McGEHEE: Committee on Claims. H. R. 1587. A bill conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to consider and render judgment on the claim of the Cuban-American Sugar Co. against the United States; without amendment (Rept. No. 85). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

72. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the president, Board of Aldermen of St. Louis, petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to the home of George Washington Carver as a national shrine; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Freely Thou givest, gracious Lord, and Thy precept teaches us that only he lives who has learned not to withhold. Oh, save us from an unfruitful waiting upon a struggling humanity that still has a long path to tread for redemption from the wild fires of scorn and hate, and before a new morning with its advancing light is irradiating this embattled world. Oh, save it from the rebel works, murmuring in the wilderness with their gilded iniquity, seeking to rock the freedoms of man with their inhumanity and shame.

Heavenly Father, do Thou bless abundantly our own United States; in humble gratitude may it in turn seek to bless Thee; help every citizen of every race to lift up the sunken, appealing ruins of wicked war into a redeemed world. Remind us, blessed Lord, that our splendid might reaches its coronation in being tolerant and brotherly, following Him who taught us all to say, "Our Father." We praise Thee that life hidden in the Divine One requires neither crown nor title to reflect the imperial majesty of its manhood. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1648) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate shall continue for 8 hours, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1648, with Mr. COURTNEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 50 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I present the first of the appropriation bills for the fiscal year 1944 with a very realistic conception of the intense desire of the American people, amounting to a mandate, that the Congress of the United States shall proceed to chart a course of the most rigid economy in nondefense expenditures and shall place effective curbs on our overgrown and vigorous bureaucracy, which has become such a dominant force in our national life and which is threatening to stifle free enterprise.

The one outstanding lesson of the recent election, a warning, as I conceive it, to Democrats and Republicans alike, and which ought to sink deeply into the consciousness of this House, is that the people know, even if we may not, that this Government of ours is getting too far away from the Constitution and that there needs to be a change of direction and a return to fundamental moorings; that the people are deeply stirred by glaring evidences of waste and extravagance and that they are alarmed by seeing the long outstretched arm of bureaucracy reaching out into every community, every business, and every home and exercising ever-increasing authority over the American way of life. They find that in the period from January 1, 1941, to December 9, 1942, 659 Executive orders were issued—mostly orders originating in the bureaus at Washington—and thus we are witnessing the metamorphosis from the Government of our fathers in the direction of a government by bureaucrats, a lethal process which, unless checked, could easily transform our Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people" from its original form and mold to a great Washington superbureaucracy.

During the last 10 years—January 1, 1933, to December 9, 1942—3,556 Executive orders have been issued, many of which, drafted in the bureaus, have had the effect of law and thus have substituted the will of bureau chiefs for the will of our legislative branch of government that was established to make the laws. During the same 10 years only 4,300 public laws have been enacted by Congress. Think of it! As a Member of this body that was established to make the laws of our country, of which you also are Members, I point out to you that the number of Executive orders issued during the last decade almost equals the number of public laws enacted by Congress. Congressional authority, which means the authority of the people, is weakened and paralyzed to the extent that the country is governed by bureau-inspired orders.

I am not going to hold any post mortem on this occasion, to try to fix the responsibility for this great bureaucracy that has been built up in Washington. If the executive establishment is to blame for excessive zeal in bureaucracy building, Congress, by the same token, must be condemned for ignobie complacency in too easily surrendering its powers. I am not going to blame anybody, but I do maintain that a situation is being created that must be corrected, if constitutional government, founded on rule by the people, is to survive.

The people are looking to this Congress as never before to see that these untoward trends are corrected; to see that the operations of government are brought within the four corners of the Constitution and kept there; to see that the rights of the States, localities, and individual citizens are made secure—and this wish of the people is a challenge to all of us, Democrats and Republicans alike. It is not a partisan question, and partisan politics should not be allowed to enter into it. It is a fundamental question of what is best for America now and for our children and children's children down through the ages.

PEOPLE ARE THINKING IN TERMS OF JEFFERSON

The people of America everywhere are turning away from the Tugwell bureaucratic type of thinking, with its ideas of killing little pigs and converting them into soap grease, plowing under every third row of cotton, and paying farmers for what they do not raise. That kind of thinking is not Democratic thinking. It is not Republican thinking. It is an exotic brand of thinking which can never successfully be transplanted to American soil. More and more—and I can sense it everywhere—the people of America, Democrats and Republicans alike, are turning to the sound thinking of Thomas Jefferson, who dwelt upon economy in government as a primal virtue, and who asserted that "the government is best that governs the least."

From out of the background of history comes Thomas Jefferson to aid us in the solution of the paramount problems of this tragic era. We in this House will do well if we will sit at the feet of Jefferson and gain inspiration from his ideas of economy and constitutional government.

In the reconstruction of thought and procedure which must take place if we follow the election returns, this House is destined to have its important part. If ever there was a time when Congress should rise to the heights of its responsibilities as a defender of constitutional government against the encroachments of bureaucracy, that time is now, and I have faith to believe that this Congress is going to make itself both known and felt as the instrumentality of government closest to the people.

In this evolution the Appropriations Committee, presided over by the able and resourceful gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], which has initial control over the purse strings, is in a position to assert a wholesome and effective national leadership, and I am sure that in the manner of its discharge of its heavy duties and responsibilities at this crucial time our committee will justify itself. We will vote to the Commander in Chief every dollar needed to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion, colossal though the amounts will be. There will be no niggardliness about war appropriations, but we will be watchful against waste in war as well as civil expenditures; and, if I correctly sense the situation, nondefense, nonessential estimates will be cut as never before. Blanket-check appropriations are out of the window.

CONSCIENTIOUS EFFORT TO REDUCE APPROPRIATIONS

In the preparation of the bill now before us we members of the subcommittee have made a diligent, earnest, conscientious effort to scrutinize every item and to apply the rule of economy wherever possible. In many days of tedious hearings we heard a large number of witnesses, including the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, who gave us the over-all picture of their Departments. In the deliberations of our subcommittee members belonging to opposing political parties worked together in common devotion to the country's best interest, thus again justifying the tradition that we park our politics in the anteroom. Our few differences of opinion were settled amicably on the basis of majority rule. I wish to testify to my great esteem for the members of our subcommittee—Messrs. O'NEAL, MAHON, CURLEY, TABER, KEEFE, and DWORSHAK—and to say how highly I value the privilege of serving with these very able men, and I would like also to express publicly my deep appreciation of the helpful services of our efficient clerk, George Harvey.

SERVICE ESTABLISHMENTS

It will aid in a better understanding of the bill now before us—the one making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments—if we will just remember that both of the Departments embraced in this bill are primarily and essentially service establishments. There is not a dollar in this bill for the purchase of land; there is not a dollar in it for the construction of buildings; there is not a dollar in the bill that is not for salaries for services to be performed or for materials, equipment, research, or other facilities essential in the rendering of services.

The picture in both Departments is one of vast, almost amazing, expansion in the various fields of service. An example in the Treasury Department is an enormous increase in the load of checks issued by the Division of Disbursement and paid by the United States Treasurer. The Division of Disbursement estimates that it will handle in 1944 a total of checks, bonds, and collections, 71,314,115 items, as against 61,434,882 items in 1942, an increase in round figures of 10,000,000 items. Even more staggering is the increase in postal business. Through its 43,638 post offices and 6,480 branches and stations, the Postal Establishment during the fiscal year 1942 transported and delivered 30,117,633,460 pieces of mail, weighing 3,244,719 tons, an increase of 881,842,132 pieces of mail and 120,492 tons over the fiscal year 1941. Reports from the 187 largest post offices, which produce approximately 64 percent of our postal revenue, for the first 5 months of the current fiscal year 1943, show a continued increase in special service transactions as follows:

| | Percent of increase |
|---|---|
| Pieces of paid registry | 122.61 |
| Pieces of free registry | 61.82 |
| Pieces of insured | 31.67 |
| Pieces of c. o. d | 7.40 |
| Pieces of special delivery | 13.61 |
| Money orders issued | 18.25 |

It is axiomatic that the mails have to be moved and we must provide the funds to handle them, and when we consider, in addition to the enormous expansion in the volume of mail and postal services, the very large but as yet indeterminate item of the Saturday overtime cost, due to recent legislation, a reduction in postal appropriations was difficult of accomplishment. However, by inserting the pruning knife wherever we thought it could be done without impairing vital activities we did make reductions in the estimates of both the Treasury and Post Office Departments, the summation of which is as follows:

Treasury Department

|---|---|
| Total of estimates presented by the Department to the the Bureau of the Budget | $528,985,805 |
| Total allowed by the Budget | 306,328,315 |
| Total carried in this bill | 302,724,416 |

|---|---|
| Total of estimates presented by the Department to the Bureau of the Budget | $927,077,786 |
| Total allowed by the Budget | 906,527,515 |
| Total carried in this bill | 899,282,855 |

Both Departments

|---|---|
| Total of estimates of both Departments combined presented to the Bureau of the Budget | $1,456,063,591 |
| Total allowed by the Budget | 1,212,855,830 |

COMPARISON OF 1944 APPROPRIATIONS WITH 1943

The bill which we present today carries for 1944 a total of $113,889,392 below the appropriations for the two Departments in the 1943 bill. The total for the Treasury Department is $110,193,684 below the appropriations for 1943, and the total for the Post Office Department is $3,695,708 below the appropriations for 1943.

MORGENTHAU AN INTERESTING WITNESS

One of the most interesting witnesses before our subcommittee was the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau. He occupied the stand for a good half day. To those who enjoy entertaining reading I would commend perusal of his testimony, pages 1 to 49 of the hearings. He gave us a broad view of the banking situation, which he pronounced "As sound, or more sound than at any time since 1933" and of the business of the country, over half of which, he ventured to say, is now devoted directly to the war effort. He told us of his plans to finance the war and to expand the revenue service to provide for the processing of 8,500,000 additional income-tax returns, due to lowered exemption features of the new legislation. He saw no danger of runaway inflation at present, but said that is something that has to be watched "every single minute."

There are lots of ways of meeting inflation—but I do not know of any more effective way of meeting it than through taxation. We have not even begun to approach the tax burden in Canada.

He said—

CONDEMNS SILVER PURCHASE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman care to yield or does he not wish to be interrupted?

Mr. LUDLOW. I shall be pleased to yield to my friend the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. While the gentleman is discussing Mr. Morgenthau's testimony, will the gentleman give us some enlightenment as to his opinion concerning the Silver Purchase Acts and the vast stock piles—upward of almost 3,000,000,000 ounces of silver—now tarnishing at West Point on the Hudson?

Mr. LUDLOW. I believe I can answer that best by quoting the exact language of the Secretary of the Treasury.

One of the high lights of his testimony was his unqualified condemnation of the silver purchase subsidy.

If it were left to me I would strike the silver legislation right off the books—

He said.

Speaking of the need of the vast accumulation of silver in the production of implements of war, he said:

Left to our own devices we would be in favor of striking all silver legislation off of the books and make it possible for us to make use of the silver, other than that which is back of the outstanding currency, available for war purposes.

It was brought out in Mr. Morgenthau's testimony that the gross public debt at the end of the current fiscal year will be about $136,000,000,000, but he would not venture an opinion as to what would be a safe debt limit. On that point, he said:

We have a war on our hands, and we must win it, and under those conditions the debt limit question will have to take a back seat.

FARMERS' IMPROVED FINANCIAL POSITION

We reduced the estimate for payments to Federal land banks on account of reductions in interest rate on mortgages from $22,800,000 to $21,800,000 and the estimate of payments to the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation from $8,200,000 to $7,400,000. These payments cover the difference between the interest rates which the loan contracts bear and the statutory rate of 3½ percent which Congress has provided shall be collected on these loans. The average contract rate, estimated as of June 30 next, is 4.863 percent. The number of outstanding loans in both categories has declined every year for 7 consecutive years, and the rate at which the farmers are now repaying their loans, and repaying them in full, led our subcommittee to believe that both estimates would stand a reduction. If this should turn out to be overoptimism, no harm could be done and no one's interests would be jeopardized, as these payments are a legal obligation and the difference would be covered by a deficiency appropriation. It will be noted on page 68 of the hearings that Dr. C. W. Warburton, Deputy Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, sent me a letter voluntarily proposing that these estimates be reduced in the sums of $500,000 and $400,000, respectively, on account of the improving farm financial picture.

FOREIGN FUNDS CONTROL

For Foreign Funds Control we allowed $4,100,000, which is $250,000 below the Budget estimate and $900,000 below the appropriation for 1943. The funds of 35 countries are now blocked under Executive Order 8389, which set up the Foreign Funds Control, and the total amount of the blocked property is $8,500,000,000. This is an involuntary control, except for China, which asked that its property be taken over under a freeze order. There is no compensation for managing these foreign-owned properties, as it is a measure in the interest of and for the protection of America. In the last fiscal year the Control returned, unused, $478,000 of its appropriation. One of its functions, that of supervising business enterprises, has been taken over by the Alien Property Custodian, and it is believed the Control can get along with the appropriation we have allowed.

NEW ACCOUNTING SYSTEM

In the Treasury appropriations for the fiscal year 1943 we allowed $150,000 to begin the creation of a new streamlined system of Government accounting and reports under the Bureau of Accounts, as provided for in Executive Order No. 8512. A good start has been made toward the establishment of that system, from which much benefit is expected in the way of bringing order and efficiency out of a very disordered, imperfect, and lackadaisical Government accounting service. The subcommittee noted that a very pleasing harmony exists between the Treasury Department and the General Accounting Office in the construction of this new governmental accounting machinery, and we allowed $150,000 to continue the work.

Because of the mounting load on the Bureau of Disbursement, we allowed that bureau an appropriation of $2,900,000, which is $196,587 more than its combined regular and supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1943.

For a similar reason we allowed an appropriation of $3,800,000 for salaries and expenses of the Bureau of the Public Debt, an increase of $1,200,000 over the amount provided for the current fiscal year. In the varied activities and operations connected with financing the war this Bureau is functioning in high gear, and its costs of operation have shot upward. When a loan has been outstanding for two years it automatically is taken over from the expenses of loans roll to the Bureau of the Public Debt for permanent servicing and this is piling up work on the Bureau rapidly as the public debt grows.

MONEY FOR SALE OF BONDS

For the indefinite appropriation, "Expenses of loans," we allowed $57,000,000 as against a Budget estimate of $58,690,000, and $45,000,000 for the current fiscal year. We believe that an appropriation of $12,000,000 above the current year's figure will suffice, but if it should fall short a deficiency will be entertained. This appropriation covers a budget allocation of $9,300,000 for the sale of War Savings bonds and stamps, a decrease of $2,700,000 below this year's allocation for that purpose. The War Savings staff asked the Budget for $12,000,000, and the Budget reduced the estimate to $9,300,000 and directed that the cut be applied to the expenditure for printing and binding. For printing and binding the staff had well over $4,000,000 in the fiscal year 1942, and the amount it has in the present fiscal year is $5,300,000, while the amount involved in the appropriation estimate for 1944 is only $2,288,000. Harold N. Graves, Director of War Savings sales, told us that his organization will stand on the Budget figure and make every effort to reduce its printing and binding costs accordingly. It is interesting to know that about 275,000 persons are now engaged in selling War bonds under Mr. Graves's direction, of whom only 1,250, including 350 in Washington and 850 in the field receive any compensation whatever for their services. It is estimated that 50,000,000 people now own bonds of the E series, which is the bond of $25 maturity value. The goal of the bond-selling campaign is $1,000,000,000 a month. At the present time 160,000 firms have the pay-roll voluntary deduction plan as compared with 10,000 a year ago, and 23,600,000 persons in private firms and Government agencies are now having money deducted from their pay every month to buy bonds.

TREASURY'S BIG LOAD

An idea of the expansion of work in the Office of Treasurer of the United States may be obtained from the fact that he expects to clear the enormous total of 161,700,000 checks in 1944 as against 138,385,000 in 1943, an increase of 23,315,000. We allowed him an increase of $200,000 over his 1943 appropriation to cover the cost of increased operations.

ELIMINATION OF COMPTROLLERS

We have taken an economy step which we hope will have the support of Congress by writing into this bill a provision for the elimination of comptrollers in the Customs Service. There are seven of these officers. The following information in regard to the locations of the offices, dates of expiration of terms of service, and salaries paid was furnished to us by the Bureau of Customs.

| Place | Date of expiration | Salary |
|---|---|---|
| New York | Nov. 30, 1945 | $8,750 |
| Philadelphia | May 31, 1946 | 6,000 |
| Boston | Dec. 16, 1946 | 5,600 |
| Baltimore | Feb. 28, 1938 | 6,000 |
| New Orleans | Aug. 15, 1941 | 6,000 |
| Chicago | Mar. 30, 1942 | 6,000 |
| San Francisco | Nov. 21, 1939 | 5,600 |
| Total | | 43,950 |

Comptrollers of customs, it was brought out in our investigation, are political appointees who perform no duties that cannot be performed by other employees in each office, who, as a rule, are much more familiar with the work. Assistant comptrollers are civil-service employees who in every case have been selected from among qualified customs employees who were appointed into the service through competitive civil-service examination. If the comptrollers were abolished, the present assistant comptrollers with the existing organization, would carry on without the slightest inconvenience, and the taxpayers would be saved $43,950 annually. That these offices can be dispensed with is shown by the fact that the comptrollership of customs at San Francisco, one of the seven places, has been vacant since November 21, 1939, without the least detriment to the public service. Comptrollers are appointed for 4 years, but when their terms expire they continue to serve unmolested, several of the present incumbents being now in that status. In 1940 the House, with Treasury Department backing, passed legislation to abolish the comptrollers, but it was stopped by Senate opposition. At that time E. R. Ballinger, of the Office of Secretary of the Treasury, was questioned by this subcommittee:

Mr. LUDLOW. Do you think this position could be dispensed with without injury to the public service?

Mr. BALLINGER. Yes, sir; in my opinion they can be dispensed with, because in every office we have competent assistants who are well qualified to do that particular job.

On account of war impacts, the customs business has receded since 1940, and, if comptrollers were nonessential at that time, they are doubly nonessential now. Here is an opportunity to show that our service to the cause of economy is not mere lip service. Let us give the taxpayers a break by wiping these useless positions out of existence.

REFUNDS AND DRAW-BACKS

The Bureau of Customs came before us with a request, urgently supported by importers from New York and Boston, that we change the appropriation for customs refunds and draw-backs from an annual specific appropriation to an indefinite appropriation. In justice to our obligations as members of the Appropriations Committee we could not see our way clear to do this because an indefinite appropriation is removed from the watchful eye of the committee and we felt that the proponents should come before us with an annual justification and showing of need. It may be that in some instances importers suffer a hardship by delay in receiving the refunds due them, but this can never be for a long period, as Congress acts promptly on requests for deficiencies to replenish this fund.

On the other hand, we did yield to the request of the Bureau of Internal Revenue that internal revenue tax refunds be changed from a specific to an indefinite appropriation, but the cases are entirely dissimilar due to the enactment by the last Congress of the withholding tax. There was abundant expert testimony by revenue officials that, with the withholding tax entering the picture, the internal revenue refund system cannot be operated except on an indefinite appropriation basis. Estimates of the amount of withholding tax refunds ran as high as half a billion dollars a year, but it was contended that the prospect is so speculative and obscure that any definite appropriation figure would be a mere guess in the dark, with which our subcommittee agreed.

Most of these refunds, I may say, will be refunds to poorer people in small amounts, and we felt it would be very unjust to set up an arrangement that would prevent them from securing their money promptly.

INCREASE FOR INTERNAL REVENUE BUREAU

The broadening of the tax base has placed on the Bureau of Internal Revenue a vast additional burden, and to cope with this burden we allowed the Bureau an increase of $5,532,385 over its 1943 appropriation of $89,561,680. Of this increase, $5,308,452 will pay for personal services. Five thousand five hundred and four permanent field employees who were employed for a fractional part of the fiscal year 1943 will be paid for a full year in 1944 at an added cost of $4,672,217.

FEW ARMY DRUG ADDICTS

For the continued maintenance of the Bureau of Narcotics through 1944 we allowed $1,100,000, which, though a reduction of $100,000 below the Budget estimate, will enable the Bureau, we think, to carry on in its usual effective way. Dr. H. L. Anslinger, the Commissioner of Narcotics, gave us a very hopeful picture of drug addiction in the armed forces. On page 484 of the hearings this testimony appears:

Mr. LUDLOW. What do the Army enlistments show so far as drug addicts are concerned, compared with the other war?

Mr. ANSLINGER. In the last war, out of some 4,500,000 men there were 3,000 rejected for drug addicts as such. Out of the present Army of 4,000,000 men, so far as we know, not more than 100 have been rejected because of drug addiction which is a very heartening thing, because the last war created an army of drug addicts. Now this time they are weeding them out. This we did not do in the last war.

Mr. LUDLOW. What could you say about drug addiction in general; is it on the increase or decrease?

Mr. ANSLINGER. It is down so far that it is a bit startling.

GOOD WORK IN REDUCING COUNTERFEITING

A similar encouraging report in respect to counterfeiting was made to us by Frank J. Wilson, Chief of the Secret Service:

Tell us about counterfeiting. Is it increasing or decreasing?

He was asked. He replied:

I am very glad to report, Mr. Chairman, that counterfeiting is decreasing and that it has shown a decided decrease since we started a new method of fighting counterfeiting.

This new method included the showing of a motion picture on counterfeiting which reached over 8,000,000 people and the Nation-wide circulation of a 32-page booklet on the detection of counterfeit money entitled "Know Your Money."

FINE SCHEME THAT DIDN'T WORK

A new industry, however, is the attempted counterfeiting of War Savings stamps of the 25-cent denomination, but before any could be put in circulation the Secret Service arrested 6 defendants and seized $52,000 worth of War Savings stamps, with the entire plant and equipment. It was a fine imitation and a fine scheme but it didn't work.

POSTAL VOLUME AN ALL HIGH

Postal volume is now an all-time high and the picture in that department is one of vast and unprecedented expansion with very unreliable indices to determine direction and progress with precision. The Department estimates that its audited cash expenditure in the fiscal year 1944 will be $906,527,515, and its audited revenue will be $910,000,000 by which token it will find itself with a comfortable over-all surplus of $3,472,485 at the end of the fiscal year 1944. But it is very doubtful whether that attractive surplus will stand up in the finals. Every time the Postal Service approaches the black something happens to set it back. This time one of the retarding factors is the new Saturday overtime law which gives time and a half on Saturday in lieu of compensatory time on some other day of the week. Shortage of manpower in the Postal Service is making it impossible to grant compensatory time and is throwing large blocks of employees over into the Saturday overtime bracket and that coveted 1944 postal surplus of $3,472,485 probably will be nothing more than a will-o'-the-wisp, after all. At the most, postal estimates of receipts and expenditures are but little more than "best guesses" as the Department at present has no cost ascertainment facilities that are worthy of the name. Postmaster General Walker, a shrewd businessman and fine executive, lamented that while fate has placed him at the head of the largest business organization in the world—the United States Postal Service—it has given him no means to determine his factors of cost, which seemed to him incongruous, as it did also to us, so we provided in this bill funds whereby he may set up what we hope will be adequate cost ascertainment facilities under the Bureau of Accounts.

In all probability this cost ascertainment unit is going to find the promise of a future surplus completely illusory. Saturday overtime is likely to grow like a rolling snowball, for the manpower problem in the Postal Service is one of increasing seriousness. So far, more than 25,000 postal employees have joined the armed forces and in many instances the reserves of substitutes have been sapped to depletion.

Other unprecedented items of cost are further operating to throw the Post Office Department off of its financial balance. Among these is the free mailing privilege to the soldiers. On the basis of 6,000,000 men in the service the postal establishment is now handling 1,453,920,000 pieces of first-class mail per year free, resulting in lost revenue of $43,617,600 per annum at 3 cents per piece.

FREE MAIL 1 PIECE IN EVERY 10

The ordinary citizen of this country, and I think it is true of Members of this House, will be surprised to learn that including free mail to soldiers, penalty mail, franked mail, and so forth, 1 out of every 10 pieces of mail is handled by the Postal Service without the payment of any postage whatever. One-tenth of the vast volume of mail in number of pieces is handled free. Without the free mail to soldiers the ratio of free to paid mailings would be 1 to 20.

PENALTY MAIL THE BÊTE NOIR OF THE DEPARTMENT

Penalty mail—the free mail of Government departments, bureaus, commissions, and so forth—has become one of the Department's biggest and sorest problems. It is growing by leaps and bounds. The Postmaster General told us—see page 7 of the hearings—that he estimates the loss of revenue in the fiscal year 1942 on account of penalty mail was $71,000,000, and the first 6 months of 1943 show that this stride is being accelerated. The number of pieces of penalty mail in 1942 was 1,516,015,444 as against 1,123,563,721 in 1941 and 999,138,119 in 1940.

CONGRESSIONAL MAIL ON DECLINE

Meanwhile franked mail—the free mail of Members of Congress—has been showing a steady decrease. In 1940 there were 45,136,539 pieces of franked mail on which, if postage had been paid at regular rates, the revenue would have been $1,217,561. In 1941 the franked mailings decreased to 30,920,380 pieces on which the postage at regular rates would have been $926,843. There was a still further decrease in 1942 when the number of pieces of franked mailings was 24,460,040 and the loss of revenue was only $767,028.

What should be done in respect to putting a curb on penalty mail is a matter to be considered by a legislative committee and does not come within the purview of the Appropriations Committee, but there was a very pronounced opinion among our members, as well as among the witnesses from the Department, that something should be done to keep the situation from getting entirely out of bounds. A department, bureau, or other activity may put out all the free mail it chooses to issue, just so it is official. Only the sky is the limit. Some members of our subcommittee were inclined to the view, which seemed to meet with favor among postal witnesses, that the problem of restricting penalty mail to proper bounds could be solved if Congress were to make definite appropriations for postage to the various units in the executive establishments and require those units to justify their postage needs in estimates before the Appropriations Committee.

POST-OFFICE INSPECTORS

We had presented to us a request for 100 additional post-office inspectors, with an annual salary obligation of $260,000, and with a commensurate increase in clerical personnel and the related travel item. The Postmaster General, when he was before us, very impressively stated the need of additional inspector personnel. There are now 750 inspectors, of whom 141 are assigned to postal work in connection with the military forces. A very important part of the inspection service is the examination of post offices in order to recommend improvements in service and to guard against defalcations. The ideal arrangement would be an examination of every one of the 43,638 post offices once a year, but, of course, that is obviously impossible, and in extreme cases examinations have been made only once in 3 or 4 years.

Of the value of the inspection service there can be no doubt. It has been described as the eyes and the ears of the Postmaster General. Its possibilities of usefulness are almost unlimited and unquestionably a thousand or more inspectors would find plenty to do, but it is a costly service and its expansion must be held within reasonable limitations.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield, with pleasure, to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HARE. I notice from the hearings that the number of inspectors was increased last year.

Mr. LUDLOW. One hundred new inspectors were allowed last year.

Mr. HARE. The Department also asks an increase this year. I do not mean to criticize the work of the inspectors, but I notice that the backlog of cases has increased from 61,000 to 72,000 as compared with a year ago. In other words, as the number of inspectors has increased, the number of cases left over at the end of the year has increased somewhat correspondingly. The gentleman from Indiana is quite astute and is also a philosopher; I was wondering whether or not he has made any study for the purpose of determining whether or not the backlog of cases should not decrease annually in proportion to the increase of inspectors, by finding out the predominant violations of the law and seeing if it were possible to decrease these violations. I had the impression when all postmasters were placed under the classified civil service and became familiar with the duties of their offices that there would be increased efficiency in the administration of these offices and necessarily a decrease in the number of cases making it necessary for the services of inspectors.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman certainly reasons logically. If we were to consider only normal times, he would be eminently correct, but the war has terrifically dislocated the inspection service as it has everything else, and added vast new obligations and vast new categories of service; and the regular operations have been disturbed and diverted on that account.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has consumed 50 minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in recent years we have been most liberal in building up the force, and last year we allowed for the appointment of 100 additional inspectors. In this bill we have granted 25 more inspectors, which, we believe, will materially reduce the load on the inspection service.

POSTMASTERS' SALARIES

We allowed an increase of $1,750,000 for the payment of compensation to postmasters, raising the amount from the appropriation of $51,750,000 in 1943 to $53,500,000 in 1944. Under the law postmasters are paid on the basis of the receipts of their offices. When the receipts warrant they are entitled to an increase of compensation and this appropriation is nothing more than a mathematical adjustment. The same is true in reference to assistant postmasters, for whom we allowed an increase of $847,200 to cover statutory requirements.

BUDGET ESTIMATES ALLOWED FOR CLERKS AND CARRIERS

For the great blocks of postal employees, including clerks, of whom there were 85,162 on November 30 last, and city delivery carriers, of whom there were 58,531 on the same date, we allowed the exact Budget estimates, $239,000,000 in the case of clerks and $165,000,000 in the case of carriers.

In all probability the Budget figures, which we allowed, will prove to be below the actual cost of the clerical and city delivery services by millions of dollars, but no harm can be done by appropriating the amounts estimated for, as the Department has authority to employ all of the clerks and carriers necessary to handle the mails and then to return to Congress for deficiency appropriations to cover the cost when the needs of the service can be better ascertained. That has been the rule for years and it has worked satisfactorily.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. ANGELL. Is any increase allowed in this bill for postal employees? I receive a great many letters complaining that they have not had an increase in pay for years.

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that we have no authority in that matter. It was not before us. It could not come before us without a legislative authorization. It will have to be brought up later and can be brought about only when legislation is passed by Congress.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Will this bill as reported by the gentleman's committee permit of any increase to these low-paid employees of the Postal Service whose salaries have not been increased for many years?

Mr. LUDLOW. It would require legislation to adjust the salaries. We have not, therefore, carried any increase in this bill. We could not do so.

Mr. ANGELL. May I say, if the gentleman will permit, it seems to me these Government employees in the Postal Service should be given increases in pay, while we are increasing the pay of Government employees in various other lines, particularly war activities. I understand we have not given the postal employees increases in 17 years. They are grossly underpaid. If we cannot provide for these long-deserved increases in this bill, I hope legislation will be passed before we end this session. The increased cost of living is a heavy load upon these underpaid Government employees.

Mr. LUDLOW. Personally, I am very sympathetic with the gentleman's suggestion, because the postal employees have not had an increase in salary for 17 years. The cost of living meanwhile has gone up tremendously and I think they have a very good case, but that has to be handled by legislation. I am in favor of such legislation. It cannot be handled by this bill.

Mr. BENDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. I commend the gentleman's fine statement except for his last comment about postmasters receiving an increase, and that increase being a mathematical transaction. As the business increases they get an increase in compensation.

Mr. LUDLOW. By statute.

Mr. BENDER. By statute; yes. The point the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL] makes is something that interests all of us. Why is it that these regular employees of the Government, the people who come closest to the families in our communities, are treated so niggardly? Why is not some effort made to compensate them in accordance with the regular increase that has been given other employees?

Mr. LUDLOW. Again I express my sympathy in line with the gentleman's suggestion. I think that is on the way. That legislation is on the way through Congress now. There is existing legislation authorizing automatic receipts to postmasters and assistant postmasters, based on receipts.

Mr. BENDER. It has been on the way for the last 4 years and it has never reached home plate.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman appreciates that we are an appropriation committe. We cannot appropriate money unless authorized to do so by an act of Congress.

Mr. BENDER. I have no complaint about the gentleman or the committee.

Mr. LUDLOW. We cannot do anything about it. No matter what amount is appropriated the Department can pay no salary greater than the schedule fixed in the statute.

Mr. BENDER. I think it desirable to call this condition to the attention of the Congress at this time, when appropriations are being made.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think that is entirely proper, and I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. BENDER. The 10-percent increase granted other Government employees did not apply to the postal men; is that correct?

Mr. LUDLOW. All employees who did not receive an increase under the overtime provisions of the new law were granted a 10-percent flat increase.

Mr. BENDER. When was the last law passed?

Mr. LUDLOW. The temporary overtime law was passed in December 1942.

Mr. BENDER. That temporary overtime device, then, is interpreted as an increase in pay? This did not apply to carriers and clerks.

Mr. LUDLOW. There was in that legislation a straight 10-percent increase in pay for all postal employees who did not receive an increase through the overtime provisions.

Mr. BENDER. There was no 10-percent increase. It provided for giving them more for overtime.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am advised that the postal employees did get an increase.

Mr. BENDER. If they worked 48 hours a week. The additional 8 hours—that is, for the overtime—is computed, and they can get an increase in pay on the basis of 48 hours' work and not on the basis of 40 hours a week, as other Government employees are paid for regular work plus the 10-percent increase. The postal employee must work 48 hours in order to get the increase in pay.

Mr. LUDLOW. It is the same as all other employees. I understand it is tantamount to an increase.

Mr. BENDER. Of course, the appropriation here does not indicate that that increase applies to the postal worker.

Mr. LUDLOW. That law expires on April 30, before this bill becomes effective, and there could not be any money carried in it for that reason.

Mr. BENDER. This is for 1944?

Mr. LUDLOW. That is right. The overtime law expires on April 30.

DONALDSON APPROVES ESTIMATES

The Department prefers to have its big personnel appropriations handled in that way. When the estimate for clerks of first- and second-class post offices was under consideration by our subcommittee and Jesse M. Donaldson, the efficient deputy First Assistant Postmaster General, was on the stand, the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. LUDLOW. Is it your judgment, Mr. Donaldson, that the Department can and does stand on the appropriation estimate as submitted here, with the understanding, of course, that the doors of the deficiency subcommittee are open for the consideration of estimates that may be later deemed necessary for the administration of the clerical service, should that time arrive?

Mr. DONALDSON. Yes, sir; I think that is thoroughly proper, more so now than ever before, for the reason that the people in the Post Office Department that are and should be most familiar with these figures are in the dark as to what it is going to cost.

Mr. LUDLOW. This is a time, perhaps, when you are, on the whole, in a more unsettled condition than you have been for a good many years, and it is pretty difficult, if not impossible, to forecast very far in advance as to your needs; is not that true?

Mr. DONALDSON. That is very true.

Later, when the estimate of the appropriation for carriers was taken up, the interrogatory was repeated, and questions and answers were as follows:

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Donaldson, as I understand it, you are content to stand on the Budget's estimate and do the best you can?

Mr. DONALDSON. Yes, sir. I might say, Mr. Chairman, while there is a deficiency looming up of around $6,000,000 it is based on normal overtime. We now pay time and a half for overtime, and I think the deficiency will be greatly increased. If we could continue on the old basis as to overtime rates, the deficiency might not be $6,000,000. With the longer workweek and higher rate for overtime, we can only guess at total expenditures. I think the best thing for us to do, not knowing just what we will have in the future, is to rely on the amount that the Budget set up, and when we come before you for a deficiency we will have a better idea of what we will require, because nobody now knows what it will cost.

Mr. LUDLOW. You think that you can so manage things that you can get along in that way without any impairment to the service?

Mr. DONALDSON. As a matter of fact, we would prefer to do that, and go along with this amount, and then we can see what our problem will be when we have to ask for a deficiency, anyway, under the new law.

So it seemed to us to be the part of prudence for Congress to stand on the Budget estimates for these great personnel groups until time clarifies the situation and we can make a more definite ascertainment of service requirements.

CLERKS AT THIRD-CLASS OFFICES

For clerks at third-class post offices we allowed an increase of $150,000 over the 1943 appropriation of $8,450,000, based on the growing needs of this service.

VILLAGE DELIVERY

For Village Delivery Service we allowed the Budget estimate of $1,500,000, which we were advised is ample to maintain all existing village delivery. No new village delivery services have been established since 1938.

RURAL DELIVERY

For Rural Delivery Service we allowed the Budget estimate of $92,200,000, which is the same as the appropriation for the current fiscal year, and we wrote into the bill a provision that not less than $200,000 of this amount shall be available for extensions and new service. The average cost of an extension is $87, and the average cost of a new route is $1,822. The money carried in this limitation, therefore, would provide for 2,300 extensions or 110 new routes. The Department has on hand 15 applications for new routes that have been approved and 28 applications for new routes that are being investigated. The mandatory limitation we have established will be ample to cover new service. There are now 32,242 rural routes in operation and the service is distributed equitably throughout the country.

STAR ROUTE SERVICE

The Star Route Service is expanding as railroad trains are being discontinued, and there is an assured increase in the cost of that service due to a reletting of contracts in the Third Contract Section, which will take place on July 1 next. We allowed for that service next year an appropriation of $14,750,000, an increase of $1,250,000 over the combined regular and deficiency appropriations for 1943. A new postal service by bus, known as the highway post-office service, is being tested out with very promising prospects of useful expansion. Because the Army and Navy now are carrying a great deal of the mail formerly paid for under powerboat service, we were able to reduce the appropriation for that service from $1,650,000 in 1943 to $550,000 in 1944. For the railroad transportation of mail and mail messenger service and for the personnel of the Railway Mail Service we allowed the Budget estimates, $118,000,000 and $60,530,175, respectively. If more railroad space is required than the estimate will pay for, it can be, and will be, provided in deficiency appropriations and the handling of the mails will be in no wise adversely affected.

AIR MAIL PICTURE COMPLETELY CHANGED

The war has changed the entire picture of our foreign mail service, both by surface and by air. Vast sections of the earth have been entirely cut off from our foreign air mail facilities, while on the other hand our foreign air mail service in the Western Hemisphere has greatly expanded. For foreign mail service by surface we reduced the appropriation from the 1943 figure of $2,410,000 to $675,000 due to the fact that most of this service has been taken over by boats of the Army, Navy, and the War Shipping Administration without any charge to the postal appropriation. For foreign air mail we propose to appropriate $4,500,000 for 1944, as against an appropriation of $16,055,979 in 1943. This large reduction is possible not only because of curtailment of foreign service but because the Navy is taking over operations to Alaska and Hawaii, which formerly were charges against this appropriation. For the domestic air service we allowed an appropriation of $22,000,000 for 1944, as against $24,588,115 in 1943. We were able to make this reduction because the Civil Aeronautics Board has recently ordered deep cuts in the contract rates of the American Air Lines and the Eastern Air Lines and information came to us which led us to believe that further heavy cuts in rates paid to domestic air mail carriers are in the offing. On the financial side the air mail picture, both foreign and domestic, has become increasingly brighter. In both services there is now a large excess of receipts over direct expenditures and the subsidy is near to being washed out, even when all factors of cost, direct and indirect, are considered. The war has increased the volume of air mail greatly. The military service has taken over 159 of the 324 planes that were in the domestic commercial service when the war began, leaving only 165, which is somewhat of a handicap.

REASONS FOR ELIMINATING COTTON ITEM

There is one more postal item to which I should like to advert before taking my seat. For some years we have carried in the post office appropriation bill under the head of "Post office stationery, equipment, and supplies" the following language:

> Not more than three-fourths of the funds herein appropriated for the purchase of twine shall be expended in the purchase of twine manufactured from materials or commodities produced outside of the United States.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman has shown that there is a tremendous reduction in the cost of foreign mail, and has also shown that the fact that the Army and Navy are now doing considerable mail work is reflected in a reduction in the amount carried in this appropriation bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is right.

Mr. STEFAN. Notwithstanding that fact, is it not true that the money required for this service is being spent under another appropriation bill?

Mr. LUDLOW. I imagine the additional cost of this service to the military agencies is very light because these other agencies are carrying this mail on the ships and planes that are in regular operation in military service. I cannot imagine any very great increase in cost to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. STEFAN. It costs money to haul that mail, whether the Army or the Navy hauls it or whether the regular mail service hauls it.

Mr. LUDLOW. They do not use planes and ships expressly for this mail service. It has been carried on simply as an incident to the operations that have to go on anyway.

Mr. STEFAN. We assume, however, that after hostilities cease, the cost of this service, concerning which we now show a reduction in expenditures, will again be reflected in this appropriation bill?

Mr. LUDLOW. There is no question but that there will have to be readjustments after the war ends.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. STEFAN. Would the gentleman mind referring back to rural deliveries, in which I am very much interested?

Mr. LUDLOW. With pleasure; yes.

Mr. STEFAN. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that applications are on hand in the Department for 25 additional new services, or are those extensions?

Mr. LUDLOW. The Department has on hand 15 applications for new routes that have been approved and 28 applications for new routes that are being investigated.

Mr. STEFAN. There is money in the bill for how many extensions?

Mr. LUDLOW. We appropriate money enough to cover 2,300 extensions, or 110 new routes. We have not divided it as between the two. We leave that to the Post Office Department. However, there is ample money to cover all existing applications if they allow every one of them.

Mr. STEFAN. That is what I wanted to bring out—that you have sufficient funds here to take care of all of the applications that have been made.

Mr. LUDLOW. All that are pending, whether or not they have been approved.

Mr. STEFAN. Would the gentleman care to say anything about consolidations? The Department undertook wholesale consolidation of rural routes. Is that practice going on now?

Mr. LUDLOW. I think it is to the extent that it is determined to be feasible and practicable. There were savings on an annual basis of $281,000 in the last year on account of consolidation. It is not a large operation, I may say to the gentleman, because the service has become shaken down until it is pretty nearly stable at the present time.

Mr. STEFAN. Would the gentleman care to answer a question on another subject, in which many of the Members are interested? Are not the Postal Service employees subject to the Selective Service?

Mr. LUDLOW. They are.

Mr. STEFAN. What is the situation in the Service now? Is the Service having trouble in maintaining an efficient and sufficient staff in all branches?

Mr. LUDLOW. The Service is faced with a tremendous problem of manpower. The military services have taken 25,000 men out of the Postal Service up to this time.

Mr. STEFAN. Does the gentleman have any information as to the percentage of the rural mail carriers or the clerks or members of all branches of the Postal Service who have gone into the Army or Navy?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not believe we have testimony showing percentages. It is a big problem and a serious one. It is so serious that consideration has been given to the employment of women in the Postal Service.

Mr. STEFAN. But a large number of employees of the Postal Service have already joined the armed forces?

Mr. LUDLOW. Twenty-five thousand.

Mr. STEFAN. From all branches of the service?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. Can women be used as carriers of mail?

Mr. LUDLOW. That has not been found to be especially practicable, but consideration is being given to their employment in clerical and other capacities, more than ever before.

Mr. STEFAN. For inside work?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. Referring to the appropriation made for the extension of the rural delivery service, does that appropriation include any amount for the rendition of service on holidays on rural routes?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that we appreciate his very able presentation of that matter to the committee. It was considered, but it was thought better to leave the matter to the administrative discretion and judgment of the Department. We did not take action on it. However, we appreciated the gentleman's presentation.

Mr. HARE. So no funds are included in this bill for that purpose?

Mr. LUDLOW. No funds are specifically designated for that purpose. I have no question but that under the latitude of administration it can be done. That is my off-hand opinion. It might be well for the gentleman to talk to the Postmaster General about it, since the gentleman is quite interested in the subject.

Mr. HARE. I hope the gentleman will yield me a little time on that subject before the debate is over.

Mr. LUDLOW. I promise the gentleman all the time he wants.

Mr. HARE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I should like to have the gentleman's reaction as to the influence organized labor is having in the Post Office Department on the shortening of hours of service. With the great influx of people into the large cities today because of war conditions, the situation has become such that you cannot get mail at the general delivery window from 4 o'clock Saturday until 7 o'clock Monday morning. It is shut up tight. There does not seem to be any spirit on the part of the Post Office Department to increase their service in that regard. From my observation, a sack of franked mail put in the post office over here at noon on Saturday lies in the post office there until Monday morning. They will not touch it.

Mr. LUDLOW. Undoubtedly the mail has lately been in a worse, dislocated condition than ever before. It was terribly dislocated along about the holidays, but that is due to the shortage of manpower in the first place, inevitable in wartime. Certainly the Post Office Department officials are not to blame. War conditions are to blame.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I think it is the influence of organized labor to not do very much. Special deliveries come here on Sundays, and are delivered Monday morning, and I think the post-office service is suffering from the influence of organized labor, due to the shortening of hours, and the doing of less work.

Mr. LUDLOW. We have no evidence to that effect. I repect the gentleman's opinion, but we have no evidence to indicate that.

Three kinds of twine have been experimented with to supply the large needs of the Postal Service—twine made out of jute, twine made out of cotton, and twine made out of paper. Twine made out of paper breaks too easily and therefore it may be eliminated from consideration. Experiments, repeatedly made, have demonstrated that jute and cotton twine are equally serviceable. The department makes no distinction between them as to quality.

The original purpose of our subcommittee in ordering a distribution of the money between the two classes of twine was founded in a sincere desire to assist the cotton industry of the South and we have continued to carry the provision for that reason. However, we have to admit regretfully that the purpose so far has not been achieved. Cotton manufacturers have displayed little, if any, interest in the proposal. Only one bid for the Department's last requirement of 7 carloads of cotton twine has been received and the bidder has shot up the price to 40.9 cents a pound. We feel that our well-meant efforts to help the South have not been of much avail. There is plenty of jute twine on hand and in sight at 19.9 cents a pound and to fill this order with cotton twine, instead of jute, would be the same as throwing away the differential in price, which would be $58,800. We can seen only one right course to pursue in justice to the taxpayers of America, and that is to delete the language from the bill, which we have done, with the assurance, however, that if in the future the cotton manufacturers will show more interest in the proposal and will submit bids on a reasonably competitive basis we will be very glad to consider restoring the language in a future appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes more.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. In reading over the hearings, I observe that for 1944 there is an estimated surplus of approximately three and a half million dollars. In considering postal receipts, does the committee take into consideration the 3-cent postage rate on first-class mail, or 2 cents?

Mr. LUDLOW. This estimated surplus is based on the 3-cent letter postage. We give no consideration to a change in postal rates. These estimates are based on existing rates.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. As I recall, several years ago Congress increased first-class postage from 2 to 3 cents, and this additional 1 cent was earmarked for purposes other than post-office receipts. Is that correct or not?

Mr. LUDLOW. If it is true, I am not aware of the fact. I think, on the contrary, that it was a general increase in the receipts of the Post Office Department. It is estimated that 1-cent increase on letter mail made a differential of $100,000,000. Postmaster General Farley and Postmaster General Walker have resisted any reduction of rates, because they have figured that the general receipts of the Postal Establishment could not stand a reduction that would reduce revenues in such an amount.

I have covered, I believe, most of the main features of the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill which we are bringing to you for your consideration. It has been a long presentation, undoubtedly tedious at times, and I thank you very much for your patience.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I reecho the sentiments of the House on both sides in saying that we are very grateful to the gentleman for the statement that he has made and, over and beyond that, for the painstaking conduct of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. I thank the gentleman. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, in view of the very detailed explanation of this appropriation bill which has been given by our beloved chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], I shall not attempt to retrace the steps that he has taken. Let it be said that no more indefatigable worker exists in the Congress of the United States than the gentleman from Indiana. He is very meticulous in handling the details of such an appropriation bill, and perhaps without that meticulous care which he exercises at all times, it would be very difficult to bring all of these items before you in understandable detail. I suggest that each Member of the House read the speech the gentleman from Indiana has made here this afternoon, and, as usual, I know they will find that it is a masterpiece of logic and diction. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has been a tower of strength in bringing his great ability to bear on this bill.

I may say that all of the members have endeavored to bring a bill to the Congress that would be in harmony with the spirit of the times, which is economy in Government. I would call to the attention of the public and of this Congress the fact that this is not a typical appropriation bill, in which real economies can be practiced. If gentlemen will turn to the table that appears in the report and in the hearings of the testimony of the Postmaster General, they will see, for instance, with respect to the Post Office Department just where the postal dollar of 1944 came from and just where it went. You will also find that upon an examination of the break-down of the expenditures of the Post Office Department that the Appropriations Committee in this Congress can only deal with about 5.7 percent of these appropriations. All of the rest of the post-office items of the appropriation bill are prescribed by existing law. We cannot reduce the pay of the post-office clerks or the pay of the rural mail carriers, or the pay of the postmasters throughout the country. Congress has prescribed the compensation of the employees of the Postal Service, and those are the big items of cost—personal services. About the only place where we are able to make any cut at all is occasionally in the matter of personnel. Let me illustrate. The Post Office Department came before the subcommittee and asked for an increase in the number of inspectors. They wanted 100 additional inspectors. After thoroughly going into that picture we decided that 25 new inspectors would be all they ought to have for the next fiscal year. So we reduced the appropriation by the amount that would be expended contemplating their request for 100 and our granting of 25 additional inspectors.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not want to yield right now. If I may go on I shall yield later.

The other item was explained just before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] left the floor. That is illustrative of the few places where your committee could make reductions in these postal items. This Congress placed in the appropriation bill several years ago a provision which bound the Postal Service to buy at least 25 percent of their requirements for string, cord, and wrapping twine to be made of cotton. It was done to help out the cotton industry which was then in a slump. The cotton industry did not pay very much attention to that provision in the bill, however. Last year there was only one bidder for the requirements of the Postal Service. Do you know what the differential was? The jute manufacturers who had always furnished twine for the Post Office Department entered a bid of 19.9 cents per pound. The cotton manufacturer, only one bidder, boosted the price up to 40.9 cents per pound, a differential that on the requirements which the Post Office Department under existing law was compelled to buy made of cotton, made a difference of $58,800. There, by that one cut of striking that provision out of the Post Office Department appropriation bill we have saved the Treasury $58,800. Perhaps it would not even show in either the Budget estimate or in the estimates shown in the committee report.

I want to impress upon you that the committee has tried diligently to reduce every item of appropriation consistent with the necessity for carrying on essential service. No one will say that the Post Office Department, which is rendering a postal service to the people of this country which they pay for, should be reduced to the point where we are not giving adequate postal service, consistent with the war effort.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. Is it not true, as a matter of fact, that in all appropriations it is going to be impossible to satisfy the demand for a cut such as the public has been led to believe is possible, due to the fact that Congress had prescribed certain practices and because many of the items of expenditure are fixed?

Mr. KEEFE. Well, that is true in some cases. I do not want to say that generally that is true. I think there are many agencies of Government that can be eliminated entirely and that tremendous savings can be effected all through the Government service.

Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a moment about one of the things that I believe would show a real saving to the Government, and that is this matter of penalty mail. I think it is one of the outstanding tragedies in our country that we sit supinely by and see penalty mail in this country, which is burden upon the Post Office Department, always increasing, reaching this year the outstanding proportion of approximately $71,000,000. At the same time the franked mail privilege has shown a steady decline, so that the privilege enjoyed by the legislative department of Government, the franking privilege, this year amounts to approximately $767,000.

The Congress of the United States has been abused in certain publications and upon the radio by certain commentators, for abusing this franking privilege. I have never heard one of them say a word about the abuses of the penalty-mail provisions of law, which permit these bureaucratic agencies of Government, without restraint, without check, without restriction, to send carloads of printed material throughout this country until every newspaper office, every chamber of commerce, every store, every farmhouse in the country is littered with these brown envelopes coming from the departments under the penalty-mail privilege. I think it is high time that the Congress do something now about limiting and restricting a privilege that has been most grossly abused. When this bill is read I propose to offer an amendment to deal with that problem. I do not have time to read the interrogation which I made of the Postmaster General upon that subject, but I would ask each Member of the Congress to take the hearings and read the testimony of Mr. Walker, the Postmaster General himself, on that subject. He testifies that no one has any control whatsoever over the issuance of penalty mail by these departments.

I have in my office hundreds of publications and pamphlets being sent out by the various departments of Government that ought to be stopped. The mail should not be burdened with the necessity of carrying them all over the country. My amendment will be very simple. It will simply provide that none of the funds provided in the appropriation for the Post Office Department shall be expended for carrying mail of any official of any administrative or executive office of the Government. Now, what will that do? Do I want to stop them from using the mail? No. I want those people to go to the proper committee of Congress and say, "Gentlemen, we need some postage for sending our material through the mail." I want a committee of Congress to pass on the question as to the necessity for sending this material out. It will be a salutary check upon those departments of government that have caused such a tremendous increase in the use of penalty mail. Let us see how that has gone up. In 1939 it was $36,000,000. In 1940, $39,000,000. In 1941, $49,000,000. According to these tentative figures that were given to us, $67,000,000 in 1942. In accordance with the testimony of the Postmaster General it will perhaps be $71,000,000. Let me tell you this, that his testimony discloses that they do not have the slightest idea whether their figures are anywhere nearly correct. The best judgment that I have is that instead of being $71,000,000, if the real facts were disclosed and a real check had upon the number of pieces of penalty mail, it would perhaps approximate $90,000,000 instead of $71,000,000, because they are not now checked at all.

The law used to require them to report to the Post Office Department the number of pieces and the character of the mail they sent out, but that law has been repealed; so there is no check at all upon them; they can send a carload or 10 carloads through the mail and the Post Office Department has got to carry it. Every postmaster in the land will testify to the burden that has been placed upon their carriers attempting to get this mail out, mail that in many cases no one has asked for, no one wants, no one ever reads, and no one ever will read—an absolute loss in printing as well as postage, and yet there is an alleged shortage of print paper to the point that they are trying to cut down the size of daily newspapers. I think we can well make the start in cutting down on the number of these pamphlets that are being sent out by these new agencies of the Government that have sprung into existence lately.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. Assuming that the gentleman's amendment will prevail and that it will eliminate at one and the same time essential and nonessential distribution of pamphlets, and that the department head or Cabinet member will have to come before the appropriate committee to obtain authority to expend a certain amount for postage, what authority, in the meantime, will these department heads and agencies have for the distribution of some of the essential pamphlets?

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman should understand that this appropriation bill we are now considering does not become effective until July 1. It applies only to appropriations for the next fiscal year and all they would have to do between now and July 1 would be to come before the appropriate subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee and justify he necessity for their post-office expenditures. They have plenty of time to do that between now and July 1, I may say to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I am not finding any fault with the gentleman's idea; I am asking for information.

Mr. KEEFE. I have answered the gentleman, have I not?

Mr. DINGELL. All right.

Mr. KEEFE. There is no desire on my part to stop the agencies of the Government from using the mails; all I want them to do is to use them in a reasonable way, and I will go further than that, and I want to call attention to this: The amount of franked mail which was used last year amounted to $767,000-plus; that is what the Post Office Department says. I do not know how they checked that—whether it is any more accurate than the figures on penalty mail. Bear this distinctly in mind: Penalty mail is the mail used by the various agencies and the departments of Government; franked mail is limited to use by the legislative department of the Government and the two clerks of the House, I believe, and the Sergeant at Arms; 535 people have the franking privilege in the United States Government set-up. The $767,000 estimated cost of franked mail would amount to approximately $1,400 a year postage per Member. This amounts to about 160 pieces of mail a day at 3 cents postage on each. I wonder how many Members who are listening to me here today send 160 pieces of mail each day 300 days a year? So far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to have a specific limitation placed upon the amount of postage which I, as a Member of Congress, am permitted to use. I do not want to treat myself any differently than I want the executive and administrative agencies of the Government to be treated. I think that

$1,400 is altogether too much for any Member of Congress to consume in the matter of postage, and I think when you check into it, unless you are one of those who is sending out thousands upon thousands of printed speeches and thousands upon thousands of bulletins of the Department of Agriculture, which are charged against your frank and not against them as part of their penalty, I believe that the real business of the Congress could be carried out with a very severe reduction in the amount of postage that is allowed or that might be allowed to Members of Congress themselves.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. I have been allotted $50 worth of air-mail stamps, as has each Member of Congress. In the last year I have not used three of them because I can send mail to my constituents in New York just as fast by ordinary mail as I can by air mail. What shall I do with the balance of those stamps?

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman need not take them, need he?

Mr. CELLER. Why should we be allowed them? They are practically rotting in my safe.

Mr. KEEFE. So far as I am concerned, if you examine the records you will find that the proposition of giving Members of Congress $50 of air-mail and special-delivery stamps has saved thousands upon thousands of dollars in the use of telegrams. Telegrams used to be sent most frequently. Certain Members used to be very prolific in their use of telegraph facilities; they used to write letters and send them by telegraph to the west coast. Members who represent districts in the far West are entitled to have their mail expeditiously handled. In order to save on telegraph bills this privilege was given to Members of Congress, to use $50 of air-mail stamps annually.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. MAHON. I agree wholeheartedly with what the gentleman says about the saving that has accrued to the Government by reason of this $50 allowance for air-mail stamps. I should like to say to the gentleman from New York who states that the stamps are practically rotting in his safe that a Member of Congress should not get the stamps in the first place unless they are needed.

Mr. CELLER. Why should we be given them? I did not ask for them.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman has to make written application to get them.

Mr. KEEFE. The law requires that a written application must be made for these stamps by the Members of Congress. I may say to the gentleman from New York that if he has any stamps which he cannot use, he should immediately return them to the disbursing office.

May I call attention to the fact that whenever a department of the Government uses the air mail it must buy air-mail stamps. They have to buy air-mail stamps and affix them to any mail they send out for delivery by air mail. It would seem to me that when they are sending out these thousands upon thousands of brown envelopes they could be put through a metering machine with very little difficulty and thus there would be some check upon what they are sending out and the burden each department is throwing upon the postal facilities. If the Post Office Department had half of the amount they spent for penalty mail next year, the Post Office Department would show a real cash surplus in its operation. We hope to be able to operate without any deficit for the first time next year. I believe it is the duty of Congress to take some action, and I know of no way that it can be expeditiously done except through the adoption of the amendment which I expect to propose. I may say that I do not believe that my amendment will be objected to either by the Post Office Department or the Bureau of the Budget itself.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. In view of this ruling which prevents families of soldiers sending them papers and magazines unless the soldier requests it of his commanding officer, how would it be to limit the department to mailing such periodicals or material as they have only upon request? In other words, wait until they are asked before they send it out.

Mr. KEEFE. I may say to the gentleman if he will read the law he will find in the very act that provides for free mailing privilege to the various officials of the departments of Government, a provision which was intended to take care of that very point. There is a provision which was intended to prohibit them from sending out material of the kind that is going out until a request for that material had been made to the agency or department.

Mr. CASE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE. I am much interested in the gentleman's remarks about savings. I wonder if he has given any thought to an amendment which would put some curtailment upon long-distance telephone calls by bureau officials? Members of Congress may not frank telephone calls. Telegrams become matters of record as to what they contain. It is my observation that there are department heads and departmental agencies that use the long-distance telephone to great extremes. I hope the gentleman has some suggestion as to how we can cut that out.

Mr. KEEFE. I cannot go into that question, today, although I am thoroughly familiar with it. We all know they are using the long distance until the bills are just beyond comprehension. I believe the Government's communications bill for the past year was over $300,000,000 for the various agencies. I cannot go into all those various opportunities for saving. I just want to say that here is one opportunity that every small newspaper in this country has been clamoring for. I have letter after letter on my desk from people throughout the country who say, "I am sick and tired of having my place of business cluttered up with all this stuff that is being sent out from Washington. For God's sake do something about it."

Here is an opportunity to do something about it when my amendment will be offered.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. The gentleman's observation with reference to penalty mail I feel has made a very favorable impression. There is just one concern in my mind about that. If the gentleman's amendments were approved, would there not be a material crippling of the New Deal's propaganda machine?

Mr. KEEFE. May I say to the gentleman that whether or not it would cripple the New Deal propaganda machine it should be done. One of the things that contributed to the loss of confidence on the part of many people in this country in the administrative agencies of government is the very fact that they have been overburdened with material that has been sent to them, material that they never asked for, and they cannot understand how it is that every newspaper will carry an item on the front page telling about the limitation on the use of newsprint when every mail brings to them a wastebasket full of publications from the various agencies of the Government, using the same kind of paper, and in most cases a very much better grade of paper.

Mr. O'HARA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. O'HARA. I do not know whether my colleague from Wisconsin considered any evidence in the hearings about complaints that come to him and to all Members of Congress concerning the matter of months going by without the soldiers getting their mail.

Mr. KEEFE. I may say to the gentleman that I have not time to go into that now. I have another matter I want to discuss at this time. If the gentleman will read the hearings he will find that we did go into that matter and discussed it at great length. He will find in the hearings, I think, the answer to his questions. Now I want to discuss another subject.

Mr. Chairman, in December 1942 the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, with the approval of the Treasury Department, authorized Federal Reserve banks to pay out to member banks the existing stock of Federal Reserve bank notes on hand, which were printed in 1933 and which approximated $660,000,000. A release was issued to the press, justifying this action as a contribution toward the Government's effort to conserve both labor and material during the war period. The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System indicated in their statement that more than $300,000 would be saved in the cost of printing new currency. This action on the part of the Governors of the Federal Reserve System precipitated much discussion throughout the country. Editors, financial writers, and economists have issued conflicting statements with respect to the objectives, purposes, and results of this action. Members of Congress have placed in the RECORD editorial and other comment with respect to this action, and many have attempted to forcee in this action of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve bank the beginning of a highly dangerous currency inflation program. I believe that the Congress and the people are entitled to an understandable, clear statement of the facts.

Any discussion of the problem involved and the mechanics used in carrying out this program must necessarily be somewhat technical.

I am reminded that one of my colleagues said to me this morning that Will Rogers, not the gentleman in the House but his late father, once said:

> There are two places to find an insane man. One is in the asylum and the other is where men congregate to discuss the subject of money.

I shall not attempt to be profound in my discussion of this subject and I assure you that I will try to refrain from making any insane comment on this subject. I shall attempt to confine my statement to facts which I believe can be readily accepted and understood by any thinking person.

May I say that I have had the advantage in the last 3 weeks of having had conferences with the economists who are opposed to this program as well as those who favor it. As a result of all these conferences and all the study I have been able to make on this very abstract and difficult subject, I have come to a conclusion that I came to years ago as a trial lawyer. Then I found that experts could be found to give testimony on all sides of an agreed state of facts. In discussing this problem with experts I find a lamentable lack of agreement. I am going to give you the facts as I see them, in order that the people in this country who find themselves in possession of a note which is called a Federal Reserve bank note will not be disturbed and will not lose faith in the currency of their country. If the people of this country ever lose faith in their currency, with all the bills that are, no doubt, hoarded and in hiding, and if that currency ever comes out and becomes active and becomes a bidder for this lessening supply of consumer goods, we shall be faced with a real threat of inflation, a threat that is causing severe concern to the Treasury Department of our Nation at the present time.

First of all, let us understand the fundamentals of this thing we call money. At the present time the circulating medium of the country is to be found in coins and four types of paper money. The paper money which we use as a medium of exchange consists of, first, silver certificates; second, Treasury notes; third, Federal Reserve notes; and, fourth, Federal Reserve bank notes. While there are some limitations in existing law on the amount of silver certificates, Treasury notes, and Federal Reserve notes that can be printed and issued, and while some notes are supposed to have either silver or gold or Government bonds or other collateral as security behind them, yet in the last analysis we find that the Congress of the United States, on May 12, 1933, passed an act found in title 31, paragraph 462 of the United States Code, which for practical purposes eliminated all distinctions between the various types of circulating medium. This act provided, and I quote:

> All coins and currencies of the United States (including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations) heretofore or hereafter coined or issued, shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, duties, and dues, etc.

Thus, by this act in 1933, Congress wiped out all distinctions between the various types of circulating medium.

With regard to the notes of national banking associations, the circulation privilege was withdrawn some time ago from the national banks, so such notes are no longer supposed to be in circulation. As they come in to the Treasury they are being retired.

The gentleman from California called attention to the fact that Federal Reserve bank notes are again being issued and made some inquiry as to the facts surrounding their issuance. In this statement I shall try to answer the questions that are being asked concerning these notes. I believe the man on the street corner out in the hinterland who comes into possession of one of these notes must be absolutely sure that it is as good as any other type of currency.

By other legislation the Secretary of the Treasury is compelled to maintain a relationship of parity between the various types of circulating medium. He cannot allow one type of currency to become depreciated in favor of another type of currency, under existing law. He is charged with the responsibility under the law of maintaining all types of currency on a relationship of parity.

Therefore, so far as the citizen is concerned, he may have assurance that whether the bills in his purse are one type or the other, they all have the same rights and purchasing power under the law. Fundamentally, this is the thing that you and I are interested in. Will the Federal Reserve bank note which we tender for groceries buy the same amount as a Federal Reserve note, a Treasury note, or a silver certificate? We want the people of the country to know that there is no distinction under existing law and that every type of circulating medium has exactly the same purchasing power as the other.

Difficulty is encountered in our thinking on this subject, however, when we read the law relating to the issuance of Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes. I specifically call your attention to the fact that the law gives to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, for the purpose of making advances to member banks and for no other purpose, the right to issue Federal Reserve notes. The law prescribes that said notes shall be the obligations of the United States and further provides that the Federal Reserve bank shall accompany its application for specific quantities of this type of currency with a tender to the local Federal Reserve agent of collateral in an amount equal to the sum of the Federal Reserve notes applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The law provides the type of collateral that must be deposited with the Federal Reserve agent. It might be commercial paper or direct obligations of the United States Government. Thus, without becoming technical, it is apparent that the Congress had in mind that when Federal Reserve notes were issued to the member banks for circulating medium, they would be secured by a deposit of collateral.

You have a bank in your town. There is a demand for currency there. Where does the bank get it? It makes application to the Federal Reserve bank in Chicago and says, "Ship us such and such denominations of printed bills." Under the law, either I have to tell them to charge my account in the Federal Reserve bank for those bills or I must put up collateral, which may be either United States Government bonds or bills of exchange and commercial paper. Then they will ship me these Federal Reserve notes.

In addition to this collateral requirement, the law requires that the Federal Reserve banks shall maintain reserves in gold certificates of not less than 40 percent against their Federal Reserve notes in actual circulation.

They can have a lot of notes in circulation, because they have $22,000,000,000 of Federal gold certificates in their vaults. With that amount of gold certificates, and being required to maintain only a 40-percent gold reserve, if you take pencil and paper, you can readily figure out what a tremendous expansion of the currency is possible under existing law through the issue of Federal Reserve notes that have a 40-percent gold reserve behind them.

The Federal Reserve banks are also required to have on deposit with the Treasury a redemption fund out of which these notes placed in circulation can be redeemed as they become worn own. It will be noted, therefore, that the Federal Reserve banks could receive from the Federal Reserve agent a supply of currency known as Federal Reserve notes by depositing as collateral United States Government bonds. The bonds themselves are a direct obligation of the Government of the United States and have behind them merely the full faith and credit of the Government. The Federal Reserve notes likewise are a direct obligation of the United States Government. It thus seems rather anomalous to require the deposit of United States Government bonds as collateral to secure the Federal Reserve notes as circulating medium, when both the bonds and the notes have behind them the full faith and credit of the United States Government. I am not urging that this requirement be dispensed with, but I am not unmindful of the fact, however, that if I went into my bank to borrow a thousand dollars and the banker asked for collateral, the chances are he would not permit me to execute another note and deposit that note as collateral. The requirement of the 40 percent reserve in gold certificates means little, because the Federal Reserve banks now hold about $22,000,000,000 worth of gold certificates and can easily maintain the legal gold reserve and still legally provide for a tremendous inflation of the currency through the issuance of Federal Reserve notes. In this connection, may I state with emphasis that we must have faith in those charged with the responsibility of administering our fiscal affairs. We must assume that no Federal Reserve notes will be issued except as the demand from the country for additional circulating medium requires it. In this connection it will be borne in mind that early in the New Deal, a rider was attached to an agricultural bill, giving authority to the President to issue $3,000,000,000 worth of unsecured, fiat currency. Up to date, the grant of authority contained in that act has never been exercised by the President or the administration.

Is not that a peculiar situation? My bank can go to the Federal Reserve bank and get a lot of money issued to it by putting up United States Government bonds as security. The Federal Reserve banks can go to the Treasury and get currency by putting up United States Government bonds. They can also put up commercial paper, and is it not a rather anomalous situation, that if I would go into a bank and ask to borrow $1,000 and the cashier sends over a note and I sign it and he says "Now, we have to have some collateral" and I say "All right. I will give you collateral," and I make up another note for $1,000, and I sign it and hand it over to him. Do you think he would loan the money? I am calling this to your attention for this reason. We must at all times bear in mind that regardless of provisions to be found in the organic law, known as the Federal Reserve Banking Act, the thing that is behind these notes we call Federal Reserve notes, regardless of their character, after all, is the full faith and credit of the United States Government, and if the full faith and credit of the United States Government is not sufficient behind our currency, then, for God's sake, of what value are these bonds that we are printing, that have exactly the same thing behind them? And so I want the people of this country to know and understand that there is at all times, regardless of the requirements of collateral, regardless of the requirements of silver, regardless of the requirements of gold—there is at all times behind our circulating medium, the full faith and credit of the United States Government. I am one of those who still believe that that credit is still unimpaired, and that that credit is still good, and that it is still the best credit that exists on the face of the earth, and if I did not think so, I would not be here making this speech this afternoon.

Those who think they may be protected by the requirements of silver behind a silver certificate must realize that the amount of silver behind that certificate is valued on a monetary basis and not on its market value. So, after all is said and done, should we not as Members of Congress attempt wherever the opportunity presents itself to stifle this propaganda that attempts to picture that through some chicanery of some kind we have depreciated one type of currency as against another? Should we not make sure that fear is eliminated from the minds of the people, so that they may not be induced to take their savings and put them into competition in the market for the purchase of tangible consumer goods? That is the threat as I see it of real inflation in this country, and that is why I am raising my voice this afternoon so that there may be assurance given to the people of this country to have faith in their Government. If you have faith in your Government, you must have faith in its credit as evidenced by bonds and by our circulating medium.

Mr. VOORHIS of California rose.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, if I may be permitted, I shall yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] if I have time, in a moment. I want now to direct your attention to the Federal Reserve bank notes. Authority for the issuance of this type of currency is to be found in title 12, section 445, of the United States Code of Law, and provides:

> Such notes shall be the obligations of the Federal Reserve banks procuring the same.

You will observe that the Federal Reserve notes under the law are the direct obligation of the United States Government. Under the law the Federal Reserve notes when issued are supposed to be the obligation of the Federal Reserve bank, and when they are issued the Federal Reserve banks are required to deposit with the Treasury again either United States bonds or commercial paper, or what they call lawful money, to secure the Federal Reserve bank notes which are issued.

The facts in respect to this $660,000,000 are these. You all remember the situation in 1933, when banks throughout the country were ordered closed by Presidential proclamation. It was anticipated that when those banks were opened there would be a run on the banks, and so the Treasury Department in order to make provision for that situation caused national-bank notes to be printed. They did not have time to make the plates to make Federal Reserve bank notes, and so they printed nearly a billion dollars of national currency, using the plates already in existence. They then imprinted upon those notes the words which the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] found on the bill which he referred to the other day. They printed on there "This note is secured by deposit of United States Government bonds or other collateral in the Treasury of the United States." Those notes were issued out through the country to the various Federal Reserve banks. Every Federal Reserve bank was then in a position to meet the demands of its member banks for currency, so that they would not have to close because of not having money to pay out to their depositors.

I think that was all right, I think that was a good thing and I do not think anybody did or could object to it. They issued only about $360,000,000 of those Federal Reserve bank notes at that time, out of nearly a billon that were printed. There were lying in the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks of this country $660,000,000 of these Federal Reserve bank notes. We are now faced with the critical situation growing out of the tremendous demand of people of this country for currency. Take your book and look at it and see what your currency amounts to today. In round figures all during the twenties and down to and including 1929 when we were alleged to be at the height of business activity, the amount of circulating medium in this country aggregated approximately $4,500,000,000. That circulating medium today is well up around $16,000,000,000. It has more than doubled in the past 12 months.

I am inserting a table showing these facts at this point:

[1] The figures in this table differ from the monthly circulation statements for the following reasons: (a) Beginning June 30, 1922, the form of circulation statement was revised so as to include in the holdings of the Federal Reserve banks and agents, and hence in the stock of money, gold bullion, and foreign gold coin held by the Federal Reserve banks and agents, and to include in the holdings of the Federal Reserve banks and agents, and hence exclude from money in circulation, all forms of money held by the Federal Reserve banks and agents, whether as reserve against Federal Reserve notes or otherwise. For the sake of comparableness the figures in this table for earlier years have been revised to include these changes. For full explanation of this revision, see annual report for 1922, p. 433. (b) The form of the circulation statement was revised again beginning Dec. 31, 1927, so as to exclude earmarked gold coin from the stock of money, and hence from money in circulation; to include in the holdings of the Federal Reserve banks and agents, and hence in the stock of money, gold held abroad for the account of the Federal Reserve banks; and to include in all categories, minor coin (the bronze 1-cent piece and the nickel 5-cent piece). Beginning on Dec. 31, 1927, the circulation statement is dated for the end of the month instead of the beginning of the succeeding month, as was the practice theretofore, and figures on the revised daily Treasury statement basis for "money held in the Treasury" instead of the unrevised basis are used. For the sake of comparableness the figures in this table for earlier years have been revised to include these changes. For full explanation of this revision, see annual report for 1928, pp. 70-71, and for figures for years prior to 1913, pp. 550-551. Final revisions, minor in amount, are made in some figures of the June 30 circulation statements for use in these annual report tables.

[3] Gold certificates not included in total money in the Treasury, since the gold held as security against them is included in the second column preceding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, who is responsible for this demand for currency? As far as the banks in my home town are concerned, the people who want the money are responsible for it. I do not know whether they need it for pay rolls or whether it is due to increased business, whether it is due to so many people being paid in cash, whether it is due to the Army paying the privates in cash; I do not know whether it is due to hoarding or what it is due to. I do know that if we have an increase in the currency which has now grown by leaps and bounds, it is because the people of this country are going to the banks in the small towns and asking the bankers to pass out some currency. Those banks, in turn, have to ask the Federal Reserve banks to replenish their supply. So we have a circulating medium today of perhaps in excess of $16,000,000,000, and the printing office is having a hard time to keep up with the demand for currency, in addition to the printing of stamps and the printing of bonds.

So I think when the Federal Reserve Board looked around and found this $660,000,000 worth of Federal Reserve notes locked up in the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks, which was perfectly good money the minute it was issued, they decided they would issue that money and save the printing charges on $660,000,000 worth of Federal Reserve notes. They have started to issue, and I believe have issued, substantially the whole amount. If you will look at your daily Treasury statement, you will find that this $660,000,000, or the portion that has already been issued, is carried on that daily Treasury statement as an obligation, not of the Federal Reserve banks but as the obligation of the United States Government. That is where all the difficulty arose.

The law said they should be the obligations of the Federal Reserve banks, but now it appears by process of legal legerdemain they appear in the Treasury statement as an obligation of the United States Government. How was that accomplished?

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. If the gentleman will let me finish, please.

How was that accomplished? I have before me the opinions of the legal department of the Federal Reserve System, the legal opinions of the legal department of the Treasury, and as a lawyer, having gone through those opinions and having carefully studied the law, I would say that technically the Treasury Department has complied with every law. What did they do? They told the Federal Reserve banks, "All right, you can go out and issue this currency. Now, you have to put up the security that the law requires, which is either gold certificates of United States Government bonds or commercial paper." What they actually did perhaps was this: the Federal Reserve agent in each Federal Reserve bank no doubt went into the office of the chairman of the board of that bank and said, "Now, you want to issue some currency. We have it down here in the vaults. Your member banks want money. You hand over to me—if you want $50,000,000 worth of currency—you hand over $50,000,000 worth of gold certificates. You have got them." All right. Now we have got the gold certificates and that complies with the law. "You can go on and issue your currency." But the next step, he said, "Now, instead of the Treasury holding those gold certificates, which they are prohibited from holding under the law, I will tell you what you do, Mr. Reserve Bank. You give the Treasury a deposit credit on your books for this $50,000,000. By that action you have created $50,000,000 of lawful money on the books of the Federal Reserve bank to the credit of the Treasury of the United States. Having done that, you have discharged your obligation, because the Government now takes over, and those notes become the obligation of the Treasury of the United States and are no longer the obligation of the Federal Reserve bank."

So that was done. It was one contemporaneous transaction, done perhaps in 15 minutes of time, but done strictly according to law, and because those securities were not deposited and kept there for any great length of time, word has gone out that there was some skulduggery or some shenanigans practiced by which the Treasury Department has inflated the currency to the extent of $660,000,000. Now, it is true that the Treasury has received credit for $660,000,000 on the books of the Federal Reserve banks, and they can write checks on that money and use that money. They have that much additional check-writing capacity with which to pay bills, and the Treasury, on the other side, has increased its obligation, as shown by the Treasury statement, to an equal amount. The Treasury has really lost by the transaction, because they can borrow money at about three-eighths of 1 percent. Had they issued Federal Reserve bank notes and kept them in circulation as the obligation of the Federal Reserve System, the law would have taxed those notes on the basis of one-half of 1 percent. The Federal Reserve banks would have had to pay a tax on those notes of one-half of 1 percent. So you see the Treasury actually lost a small sum in the transaction.

Mr. GIFFORD. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman has quoted the law. We voted for the $3,000,000,000. We feared that notes would be printed by the Government itself. The gentleman now says these are Federal bank notes, recently marked "Federal Reserve bank notes."

Mr. KEEFE. No. They were marked "Federal Reserve bank notes" in 1933, and I so stated.

Mr. HINSHAW. They are marked "national currency."

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. I explained why that was, because they used the old plates. That is why in the emergent character of the situation they just used those old plates; they could not have taken the time to cut new dies and new plates to print this new currency.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the reverse operation?

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman want to ask a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. This is a very important matter. I hope the gentleman will yield; I always yield.

Mr. KEEFE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GIFFORD. I will make it a question, then; it is easy. Is it not the reverse process? Formerly the Federal Reserve notes were issued for Government bonds; now the notes are purchased by the Government in reverse order; but where is your interest money? Heretofore the Government has used bonds on which the Federal Government through its Federal Reserve notes provided a circulating medium. This is just the reverse method.

Mr. KEEFE. To avoid payment of interest? I am glad the gentleman has raised this question. I am no profound money economist as is the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not want any satire about this.

Mr. KEEFE. I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact—he is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and he was here in the House, I believe, at the time—I believe in 1934 the Government attached a rider known as the Thomas amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Appropriation bill and gave authority by that rider to the President of the United States to issue $3,000,000,000 worth of unsecured fiat money. The President of the United States, however, has not seen fit as yet to use the privilege which was granted to him then, and not a single dollar of that type of money has been issued by the Treasury.

I call attention to the fact further what I indicated a few moments ago, that if the Treasury Department was motivated only by a desire to save interest through the issuance of Federal Reserve bark notes, why should they go to that expediency when, as I just got through explaining, they have power under existing law to issue Federal Reserve notes with a 40-percent gold reserve? And they have billions of excess gold certificate reserves at the present time that they can use as reserves for the issuance of Federal Reserve notes. They did not have to go to the trouble to use Federal Reserve bank notes; they did not have to do that. I am firmly convinced that the only reason they used them was to save some money for this Government and not to burden the Bureau of Engraving with the necessity of printing $660,000,000 additional money. We must assume that men comprising the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System are Americans who want to maintain our system.

Mr. GIFFORD. I hope I have time to complete the gentleman's remarks. What the gentleman states is all right, but he should tell the whole story.

Mr. KEEFE. I have not time to tell the whole story. If I had the time I should like to go into the full story and answer all arguments on the question of reserves; and I am quite familiar with it, too, I will tell the gentleman, because I have never studied anything quite so hard as I have this question for the last 3 weeks, and I have done it for one reason and one reason only. I am not talking as a partisan, nor am I speaking as a profound economist—I am speaking as an American citizen who sees danger signals ahead. The threat is to be found in this unholy inflationary threat which was described by Mr. Bell before our committee.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. I want the people of this country to know that the currency which they have is as sound as the credit of the United States. They do not need to get panicky. They do not need to begin to throw that money around and pay prohibitive prices for consumer goods and thus bring upon us a wild currency inflation. I am a Republican, and I am proud of it. However, I appreciate the dangers that confront this Nation and it is because I do appreciate the dangers in our fiscal situation that I am trying to caution those who would cast discredit upon the operations of our Treasury at this time. As a Republican I cannot believe that responsible men in our Treasury are deliberately trying to deceive the people. We must not put into the unthinking mind an idea that their Government is about to collapse because the money it issues is of no value or is of depreciated value. When the time comes that we no longer have faith in our money, when we no longer have faith in our bonds both of which are secured by the full faith and credit of the United States Government, all I can say is that if that time ever comes, God help us all; we shall not be able to save our country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

WE CAN HAVE A BETTER AMERICA NOW IF WE GET BACK HOME GOVERNMENTALLY

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, much has been said and written about a better America after the war. I believe there are many ways in which, even in these times of hostilities among nations, we can have a better America now.

This is very naturally a period of great patriotic fervor. The conflict in which we are engaged intensifies our devotion to America and what America means. Our boys are fighting on many fronts for our chance to keep it true to its high ideals. Is it not a fitting time for us to join forces with these fighting men in preserving for ourselves and for posterity the true and enduring principles upon which our Nation was founded? Surely, by such a determined policy on the home front, even now we can turn our patriotic fervor to the task of promoting and safeguarding the institutions which, with their cherished blessings of liberty, have come to us as an incomparable heritage. Our men in service want to find those institutions unimpaired when they return from the war, and they have a dominant right to expect to find them so.

In my opinion, the suggestions I shall offer for a better America now are distinctly progressive. The Constitution of the United States was framed upon the principles of progress, and we have made progress to the extent that we have remained true to its enduring teachings and adapted them to the times in which we live.

The remarks which I shall make are also an appeal for unity. Unity implies an accord of purpose and endeavor. I think it cannot be successfully disputed that the people of this country now have a great and awakened interest in keeping it true to the fundamental things for which our boys are fighting. They are not fighting for innovations in our governmental system, but for the maintenance and preservation of the rights and institutions of a free people. In that same patriotic spirit it is incumbent upon us as representatives of the people, and through the power they have vested in us in our organic law, by our counsel and necessary aid to serve our Commander in Chief and our country in keeping the old ship of state on an even keel and on the course charted by the fathers.

This is a government of the people, of the American people. They are willing to make any essential and reasonable sacrifice to keep it so, but they want to carry on in the American way of American philosophy. They have been burdened time and again with administrative orders which on their face have seemed to them unreasonable and which have been imposed upon them by bureaucratic, autocratic power without any logical explanation of their necessity. And it is through such administrative agencies that the legislative intent of the Congress is so often diverted, subverted, and perverted by the rules and regulations of those who assume dictatorially functions and powers which are legislative, judicial, and executive. Surely it is high time for the Congress to live up to the transcendent purpose for which it was created.

In his immortal song John Howard Payne expressed a sentiment which is recognized universally as true:

Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.

That line from this familiar ballad is dear to us all because in our personal experiences we have realized the accuracy of these words. Just as it is gratifying after any detour to find ourselves again on the main highway, so one of the chief delights of a period of vacation is returning to the home from which we started. In other words, it is always a helpful and refreshing experience to get back home.

It is my belief that the best and most inspiring way of fulfilling our ardent desire for a better America is to get back home governmentally. Of course, we all realize that in times of war there are many abnormal conditions and situations which require some temporary modification and adjustment of some of our normal practices, but I believe that even in the midst of such situations there are many ways of assuring a better America by adhering as closely as possible to the true and tried fundamental principles upon which we have relied so confidently throughout our history. Styles and conditions change, but eternal truths remain invariable and are applicable to every condition of our personal and governmental lives. Because of this incontrovertible fact, we do not need a new Bible and we do not need a new Constitution of the United States. We need to get back home to each. The precepts of the sacred writers are still pertinent. The basic system of our organic law is still our surest hope of governmental security.

I believe it behooves us to get back home to those personal and governmental principles and policies which the fathers preached and practiced if we are to speed the day when we shall have a better America. I wish to mention specifically a few of the many ways in which I think it is possible to get back home governmentally.

I want to see the States of the American Union get back home to the retention and the exercise of their constitutional rights. In no proper sense are they the wards of the Federal Government. In a very important sense in the philosophy of our system the Federal Government is their ward. What I shall now say has no reference, of course, to the various elements of preparation for national victory which have led to the necessary establishment in the States of the Union of strategic plants and projects for our defense and offense. I wish to speak of those other and normal processes, even antedating the war, in which the States have been forsaking and surrendering the sovereignty rightfully theirs in our dual system of government. It took centuries for such rights of the people to be wrested from autocratic power, but without that vigilance which liberty demands they can be relinquished very rapidly.

For example, in recent years these States and their political subdivisions have been very active in seeking governmental grants from the United States in furtherance of purely State and local affairs. We must awaken to a realization of the fact that there is no such thing as a governmental grant of this kind. The Federal Government has nothing to give to the people except what it takes from the people. Aside from such very definite things under constitutional authority as provision for the Army and Navy, the coinage of money, the establishment of military and post roads, and the other functions so delegated to the general government, the States by our organic law are intended to be supreme in their spheres. In the matter of these so-called governmental grants other than those under constitutional authority, from each dollar that the Federal Government takes from the States it retains and diverts a part of that sum for the establishment or enlargement of some administrative agency, and then it returns the remaining part to the States themselves provided they will expend it in such a way as Federal agents in Washington direct. The States could keep their dollar in the first place and spend it all in accordance with their own desires and purposes. And under these circumstances there would not be so many of these expensive bureaus of the Federal Government performing the functions of the States. Let us get back home to the fundamental doctrine of having each member of our dual system operating effectively within its proper jurisdiction. We will have a better America when we do.

I want to see us get back home to the matter of economic administration by the abolishment of useless bureaus, some of which were created before our active participation in the war, by the elimination of those which simply duplicate the operations of proper Federal agencies, by investigating and preventing waste and extravagance, by ridding ourselves of the delay and vexation of unnecessary red tape, and by freeing our citizenry from the necessity of spending so much of their time and money in filling out long and complicated questionnaires.

In an effort to be helpful in this regard, I have reintroduced a bill which I introduced originally almost a year ago, and which is now H. R. 83, to establish an office of fiscal investigations as an agency of the House of Representatives. The enactment of such a measure would enable us to follow up the appropriations that are made and to know in detail how these funds are used and expended. In my judgment, its adoption would result in the saving of untold millions of dollars for the taxpayers of this country. The amount of Federal revenue through taxation is now so large that people of very low income are being required to contribute in direct taxes, in addition to the so-called hidden taxes. In many instances such a part of their earnings may involve real persona sacrifice. In their loyal zeal to assure our victory they are willing to make that sacrifice, but they want to know, and they have every right to know, just what is done with their money. Let us see to it that through an agency of our own, and as their representatives, we get that information and effect the economy such knowledge will make possible.

I want to see us get back home to a practice of the sound principle of having the personnel in necessary governmental agencies familiar with the situations and problems with which they are supposed to deal. The livestock industry, the oil industry, the dairy industry, and many other essential industries have been greatly hampered by the lack of appreciation and understanding of their problems by many of those before whom it has been necessary for such industries to appear in carrying on their respective contributions to our national welfare. For example, it is well known that many dairy herds are being forced to the slaughterhouse today through rules and regulations emanating from Washington, and it should not be difficult for all of us to realize that the people of this country and our allies cannot get from dead cows the milk and dairy products they need. The livestock industry and the farmers of our land cannot carry on in their various avenues of production without the labor essential to their tasks and without a proper consideration of what is due them in every regard in these days when we are undertaking to feed and clothe not only the people of America, but many of those joined with us in our efforts for victory. This is no time for favoritism to special classes. Certainly favoritism cannot make for unity. Upon the producers of this country we all depend for sustenance and supplies. They are peculiarly entitled to fair and equal treatment.

And I cannot be convinced that the many strikes which have retarded our production for this war have had the sympathetic sanction and approval of the truly American workers of our land. Many of their sons are fighting in the mud and muck and dangers of foreign fronts. Like all patriotic citizens, real American workers are anxious that these fighting forces should not lack for the equipment and supplies necessary for our triumph. I think I speak for the great majority of loyal American workers, and I am sure I speak for the boys who are fighting and suffering and bleeding for us on many foreign fields, when I assert that they want every part of our production to carry on steadily and efficiently to our final victory. They will not, if left unmolested by racketeers who either owe allegiance to hostile lands or are in sympathy with their ideologies, stifle the production so vitally necessary for those brave souls who endure the constant hardships of active warfare in our behalf. They realize fully that labor and every other group of patriotic citizens will be reduced to serfdom and slavery if our cause should not prevail. I am convinced that these truly American workers join with us in a fervent desire to present a really militant and united citizenry, and we'll have a much better America when we do.

I think we could get back home governmentally to a very great extent if all the personnel in our governmental agencies had a full understanding and sympathetic appreciation of the obligations of their oaths of office "to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and to bear true faith and allegiance to the same." We stand very much in need of a vital and unanimous loyalty to the principles of our representative government. Only in this way can we prevent the spread of subversive and socialistic encroachment upon our fundamental system.

The American people today are suspicious of some features of a pattern they see in evident operation. They insist, as has often been insisted in this chamber, that they discern the well-organized efforts of a subversive group—and they think they detect some of them in important positions, persons in whose selection they had no voice—who are seeking to destroy our system of free enterprise and foist upon us the ideology of foreign regimes hostile to our basic and traditional purposes. They very properly warn us not to be dupes of such socialistic agents whose dominant plans seem to be to remain as parasites on our body politic and to enlarge and extend their operations by increased appropriations and personnel. In the language of the doctors, they believe that very considerable legislative surgery is indicated. They have the right to demand that we ascertain the accuracy of their well-defined suspicions. And they have the right to demand the removal from service of all who may be found to justify their fears.

It has been said that when the boys in service—who are fighting so valiantly for the preservation of the things that may be regarded too lightly by some on the home front—return to their homes they will be interested primarily in finding employment along the lines of their talent and training and experience. I believe they think they will find it more readily if they come back home to the real America for which they are now fighting. It must be borne in mind that the great majority of these boys, aside from those who were in school when inducted into the service, were employed in the small businesses of this country. I want to see us get back home to the preservation of small business in which these boys may have their jobs awaiting them. Certainly in a democratic system they cannot all be given Government positions.

But small business, which has contributed so materially to our progress, is now being thwarted and in large measure destroyed. All business in this country was small in the beginning. The average citizen has had practically all of his dealings with small business. In our economy we need both small business and big business, but the people are naturally suspicious that, if small business should be destroyed and all our operations restricted to very limited channels, it will not be so difficult after the war for subversive interests to bring about a general and popular hostility to those permitted to carry on and thus promote their nefarious contention that the Government should take over all commercial enterprise. The distance to socialistic governmental control would thus be very materially shortened. Certainly no real American could be convinced that that would make for a better America.

I want to see us get back home to that same spirit of independence and initiative and courage and industry and self-reliance and thrift which characterized the lives and labors of those who gave us this glorious Republic. We hear very little about these virtues in these strenuous times. They are becoming much too strikingly memories of the past, but they gave us this Nation. They have been, they are, and they always will be essential elements in the building of character of strong men and women. They are vital requirements of all individual and collective progress and development. Let us retain those words in our personal and governmental dictionaries and let us keep universally in our practice the sterling virtues they betoken. We will have a better America if we do.

We will have a better America when we are really the Christian country we profess to be. Religious principles inspire unity and brotherhood and not the strife and hatred and dissension that we see so often aroused and manifested. In this land of the free, where men may worship according to the dictates of their own consciences, we have expressed in our national anthem and have stamped upon our coins the ennobling sentiment that "In God we trust." I think it is high time to get that sentiment impressed also upon our hearts.

And by all means, as the dominant hope for the continuance and prosperity of this free Republic, let us make the Congress of the United States, which is so often censured unjustly for the faults and shortcomings of others, a truly representative forum of the people. It is the only forum they have. In these critical times the people of the United States are very much perturbed about the preservation of their liberties. They are not hesitating to express in private and in public their sentiments of deep concern, their mounting fears, with reference to many tendencies and policies which in their judgment threaten the maintenance of those liberties. We who serve in these two bodies of the Congress are their only direct representatives in Government to give voice to their judgment and to avert, insofar as possible by legislation, the dangers that menace the system bought for us all by the toil and blood of the fathers. By toil and blood the sons of the people are now seeking on many foreign shores to preserve that system. If there ever was a time for the Congress to exercise its constitutional functions, that time is now. We must not forget for one moment that this Government of ours belongs to the people and that for the people in essence and in practice it must be forever preserved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. May I state that I have heard the very splendid, able, clearcut, and courageous address delivered by the gentleman from Texas, which is characteristic of all the addresses he delivers to this House. I hope that all Members will take the opportunity of reading it carefully. May I ask the gentleman a question in reference to the several matters about which he complains? Does he not think that the bureaucrats and crackpots down in many of the departments of Government are largely responsible for the conditions that he has described?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not think there is any doubt in the world about that, and I tried to the best of my ability to give that thought and that impression in the remarks that I made.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I always listen with a great deal of profit to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is it not true, too, that, in addition to the mistakes which have been made at the other end of the Avenue, we in Congress have been responsible, in part, at least, for giving them that power?

Mr. LANHAM. I think it is time now for us to be not Republicans or Democrats, but all join together as loyal Americans and win this war. We should forget petty differences and cast aside the strife and dissension that so often exists, and in the real spirit of unity here which we find in the people all over the country, manifest by our industry and by our cooperation with the people that we are in hearty accord with the patriots who gave us this country, and with the followers of those patriots all through this land today.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Just one more question. In spite of all we may say about bureaucrats and the crackpots, does not the responsibility rest squarely upon the shoulders of the Congress today?

Mr. LANHAM. I think that it does very largely, as indicated in the remarks that I made. To the extent that it is possible for us by legislation to correct the evils that exist, the obligation is certainly upon us to correct them. Unfortunately the situation is that the rules and regulations of the administrative agencies interpreting the laws that we pass here are so foreign, often, to the legislative intent that the people of this country begin to ascribe to the Congress responsibility for many things for which we were in no way responsible. We have 531 Members of the two bodies of the Congress. There are approximately 3,000,000 people on the Federal pay roll today exclusive of the Army and Navy; yet this little group of 531, the only ones in whose selection the people of this country have any voice, get the great majority of the criticism, unfortunately, from the people themselves with reference to the many mistakes that are made by those in whose selection the people have no voice whatever. I think that through the adoption of the bill which I have reintroduced, or one of similar import and certainly with the same purpose, we would be enabled to obviate and to prevent a great many of these administrative errors of which we know and of which the people of this country are learning very rapidly.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, today I have introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to conduct an investigation for the purpose of determining—

(1) Whether the War Production Board, the Office of Price Administration, or any other agency or officer in the executive branch of the Government, is formulating plans with a view to putting into effect (a) requirements with respect to Federal grade labeling of articles or commodities, and the discarding of private brand names of articles or commodities, and (b) any other requirements intended to bring about simplification and standardization of production, marketing, and distribution of articles or commodities, as well as concentration of industry or production; and

(2) Whether, and to what extent, the formulation and carrying out of such plans are necessary in connection with the war effort; and

(3) The extent to which any such plans may represent an attempt to change our domestic economy along lines not authorized by Congress.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session) as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. For purposes of carrying out the provisions of this resolution, the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents, by subpena or otherwise, and to take such testimony, as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman.

Mr. Chairman, to many Members in the House all this talk of concentration brings back to us the days of the late and unlamented N. R. A. Recently I was reminded of certain testimony given by Donald Richberg, one of the official sponsors for the N. R. A. law when it was before the Congress. Our colleague from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] asked Mr. Richberg if the N. R. A. program of concentration would injure small business, putting his question in the following form:

In a general way it encourages reformers to do the same things that the cartels are doing in Europe?

Mr. Richberg, speaking officially for the bill, answered:

I think, in a general way, that may be true; yes.

I propose that we make sure that the same philosophy is not back of this current drive seeking to take advantage of the war period just as certain reformers took full advantage of a situation when our people were distracted because of the depression in the early thirties.

We hear that Great Britain has gone far along this line. Well, maybe in England such a program could have a bearing on the war effort. But British experience does not necessarily justify it here where we do not have anything like the problem they have had in England with labor and material shortages. And if we are going to have this sort of regulation here, we in the Congress must demand that we know in detail what the program is and that our needs justify it.

Coming to the question of standards, the Bureau of Standards is the best evidence of the continuing interest of the Congress in fair and reasonable standardization and simplification. But we also know there can be great danger of regimentation by standards. A standard may be good or bad. Briefly, good standards, when fully observed, protect the public against shysters, eliminate inferiority, promote fair competition, and permit more efficient business practice. Standards misused can destroy quality, create mediocrity, stifle competition, slow up progress, destroy initiative, help the shyster, eliminate brands as consumer guides, and regiment production.

The Congress has long been in favor of simplified practices in industry. We have passed many laws to encourage it. For more than 20 years we have granted appropriations to the Bureau of Standards to lead and assist industry in these efforts.

But some of us have discovered that our suspicions were well founded in regard to the activities of certain bureaucrats in these temporary war agencies. The Members of Congress have little confidence in the assertions of certain individuals that they are using the vast powers granted to the Executive strictly for war. It is all very well to claim that certain steps are in the interest of controlling prices or guarding public health, but the people told us less than 90 days ago that they want the Government to quit playing "papa." The people of the United States stand unalterably opposed to the ever-increasing paternalistic trend reflected in the theory that "papa knows best." It is bad psychology and even worse statesmanship. And some of our good friends of the last Congress who are not here today will concede that. The American people are no longer to be treated as children. If the bureaucrats downtown do not know this, Congress should help them find out.

Simplification is only one aspect of standardization. It usually has to do with sizes and varieties of commercial goods. One of the first jobs of this sort ever done concerned paving brick. There were hundreds of sizes and varieties. Government experts realized that a better, cheaper paving job could be done if all manufacturers of brick made their product of approximately the same size. So they called together representatives of the industry.

A plan was developed by which the industry itself agreed upon the useful needed sizes. The result was a plan which businessmen themselves made. After its adoption approximately 20 sizes of paving brick took the place of nearly 400 sizes. There was immediate benefit to the industry. Dealers did not have to carry as great stocks. They were not always out of the wanted sizes. They could deliver promptly what the paving contractor needed and he knew it would fit the job and serve the public. The result was a help to all because it was done in a businesslike manner with only the leadership, not the compulsion, of the Government. That is free enterprise at work under intelligent governmental leadership. Several hundreds of such programs of simplification have been guided and aided by the Bureau of Standards. I have only commendation for those efforts. But more recently we have had a misuse of such programs. It is easy to understand why the public is not benefiting by them. In these recent plans a few governmental theorists get together and decide what they want done. They may consult a few people, but essentially the result of their deliberations is an academic, bureaucratic finding. They then impose the results of their thinking on the industry by an arbitrary order.

I should say the paramount necessity is for the people to know what part of this current program of simplification and standardization is actually designed for the immediate purpose of speeding up the winning of the war and what part the bureaucrats plan as a measure of increased, permanent governmental control over business to continue after the war. We may also find some parts of the program which do not deserve even wartime tolerance because they are against the public interest and of no help at all in winning the war. If so, those parts should be quickly identified and eliminated. The apprehension of the Members of this House, as revealed in speeches made on the floor during the past 2 weeks, can best be transformed into a safety check by having it specifically ordered by legislation that certain wartime measures and regulations will cease when the war ends.

I want it understood that there is no partisanship in urging that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee pull back the curtain and let us see what is behind all this. I think I can truthfully say that members of the majority have contributed most in the denunciation of bureaucrats on the floor of the House since the elections.

I have before me a clipping from the New York Journal-American of January 23. In it the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], is quoted in connection with O. P. A. grade labeling as follows:

> There is absolutely nothing in our economy, because of the war, of such gravity as to justify any action that would destroy trade names. There is no justification for the destruction of trade-marks that signify a certain brand.

Our colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], also of the majority side, and chairman of the House Committee on Small Business, on which I have been privileged to serve, was also quoted in the same article, as follows:

> I do not approve of a policy that would obliterate trade names of standard goods whose reputations have been built up over many years and which constitute valuable business assets.

And let me add that in concerning ourselves with this problem we concern ourselves with a public problem rather than merely a problem of business. Brands have a public value. By long experience, the housewife and the ordinary citizen have learned that certain brands are satisfactory and that these brands guarantee a desired quality. It is a disservice to the housewife and to all citizens to deprive them of these guides to intelligent purchasing of goods unless the need therefor is clearly demonstrated. The brands should be protected, therefore, more in the interest of the consumer than in the interest of the owner of a brand who has created public confidence by selling an honest quality of service under that brand.

I urge that special attention be given in this investigation to what efforts, if any, have been made to correlate the activities of the O. P. A. with the operations of the Food and Drug Administration. I would like to make very sure we are not disregarding the long experience of the Food and Drug Administration and turning some of its activities over to the people Leon Henderson brought in to man O. P. A. and Civilian Supply.

I believe if we are going into a wholesale job of grade labeling, the Congress owes it to the people, in view of its long support of the Food and Drug Administration to make certain there is a proper correlation of activities and no overlapping. We might find a way to contribute to the manpower problem by approaching the question from this angle. I feel that I speak for every Member of the Congress when I tell those serving in the executive branch that the people of this country want the war agencies to confine themselves to the winning of the war and not to unnecessarily encroach upon the functions of the permanent branches of this Government.

In case these temporary additions to the executive branch do not know it, the Congress believes that some of the older men in the Department of Agriculture, for instance, have a little more experience in handling an agricultural problem than the impractical, theoretical economists who seem to occupy most of the desks in O. P. A. and Civilian Supply.

Let me illustrate: Last Wednesday, our colleague from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] told the House of the rules promulgated for the conservation of horseshoes. He read a part of the rules into the RECORD, and I just want to remind you of one of these rules. I quote:

> Horse owners can, in many cases, save shoes by removing the shoes immediately after a period of necessary road work or other work where shoes are necessary only during certain periods.

The gentleman from Virginia drew on his boyhood experience to tell us the slight inconvenience it would cause the farmers to take off the horses' shoes each evening and put them on again before starting the days' work the next morning. We are also indebted to him for giving to the House and the people of this country the identity of the author of this masterpiece. As it turned out, he was a Harvard product who came to the Government via experience limited to New York City. With that background he was selected to help administer the machinery and parts program for the farmers of America. He probably never heard of James T. Jardine, M. L. Wilson, or C. W. Warburton, who have long served the farmers of America well and with distinction in the Department of Agriculture. I suggest he telephone them for a little advice on some of his regulations.

It seems very strange, and perhaps reflects the zeal of the reformer rather than the constructive thinking of a seasoned executive, that certain forces can make a major issue of the alleged vital urgency of this program of simplification and standardization.

Just a day after Senator Byrnes became the Director of Economic Stabilization it was annnounced that Ben Cohen, whose name is certainly familiar to all of us, would be his first assistant and legal adviser. Within 48 hours Senator Byrnes wrote a letter to Donald Nelson, Chairman of the War Production Board, directing him to proceed at once with simplification and standardization. Some of us may have thought otherwise, but this program seemed to be the most important matter before the Nation when the Office of Economic Stabilization came into being.

To keep the record straight, Senator Byrnes' letter to Mr. Nelson was written November 3. One is supposed to believe that all the facts were in possession of Mr. Nelson so that he could proceed intelligently. But two and a half months later, on January 17, 1943, to be exact, the chairman of the Senate's Committee on Small Business, in a report to the Senate, declared:

> Our essential civilian requirements for food, clothing, and other necessary goods and services have not yet been determined. Consequently it has been impossible to determine the amount of labor and materials needed in producing essential goods and services.

If that finding is true, what man could be wise enough to chart a course in concentration, standardization, simplification, or Federal grade labeling? Ben Cohen was back in the driver's seat and working fast.

It also raises a question about the curtailment of printing paper. I understand there are capable and experienced men directing the Printing and Publishing Section of W. P. B. But without adequate and reliable figures on total consumption of paper by industries under their supervision, they are asked to administer a curtailment program that could threaten the press of the Nation. The decision on reduction in use of paper was made somewhere else.

I want to know why that printing-paper curtailment order was issued, on what facts as to necessity it was issued, and upon whose investigation it was issued. I want to know if the files of those responsible contain ample evidence of complete and thorough investigation proving the necessity for the action taken. A spotlight in the hands of a congressional committee is the only weapon we seem to possess to safeguard the freedom of the press and the Nation's economic and business structure.

Very frankly, I think it is the obligation of the House to find out just what is back of all this. Yes, and I might add, find out who is back of all this. I, for one, believe I owe it to the people of my district to examine and carefully weigh the background and experience of the men who are doing this advocating and planning. In the face of the mandate to this Congress on November 3, we have no choice but to stand guard against any attempt to regiment any segment of our economy unless such regimentation is necessary to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. O'HARA. I am very much interested in the gentleman's remarks and his resolution. I wonder if his resolution is broad enough in its scope to include inquiry into the condition which exists as far as the canning industry is concerned? It is my understanding that the bureaus in the W. P. B. and the O. P. A. have promulgated some rules and regulations as to limitations in the canning industry as well as certain others. We are facing a shortage of canned products. On March 1 we go into the rationing of canned goods. Is the gentleman's resolution broad enough to cover an investigation of the phase I have just called to his attention?

Mr. HALLECK. It certainly is broad enough. I think the situation to which the gentleman refers is exactly the sort of situation expected to be covered by this resolution.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. I had an experience along those lines with reference to private brands. The Agricultural Marketing Administration went into the market around New York to purchase soap, in connection with the $15,000,000 revolving fund we appropriated for the purchase of supplies for the needy in Puerto Rico. Although a certain firm in New York was the lowest bidder, the Agricultural Marketing Administration said, "We will buy that soap provided you take off your brands." I thought that was rather an unjustified attitude on the part of the A. M. A. and protested it with all the power within me, but I could not get the A. M. A. to buy that soap and retain the private brands. I thought that was outrageous.

Mr. HALLECK. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman and thank him for his comment.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAVIN. Can the gentleman tell us whether or not orders have already been issued to packers for the simplification and standardization of packages?

Mr. HALLECK. Certain orders already have been issued, and, according to the reports and the news releases, it is indicated that they are to be extended over the whole field of canned goods. Just in what detail they will be extended and in what particular way they will be worked out I do not know. The observation of the gentleman from New York simply bears out a suspicion that many of us have had that this drive has been in the background for quite a long time around here, and probably stems from some ambitions that have not much to do with the winning of the war.

Mr. GAVIN. It looks like an attempt, then, on the part of the bureaucrats to sabotage the packers and regiment them. I quite agree with everything the gentleman has said. I think we should take some definite action immediately to forestall the bureaucrats who have been taking over business, bureaucrats who never built a business, and never attempted to develop an industry, upon which thousands of people are now dependent. It is about time we recognized the seriousness of the situation as far as the packers are concerned and gave some attention to this matter before it is too late.

If these theorists, who are trying to make over our American way of life, had ever raised the necessary money to create a business and slaved 14 to 16 hours a day to secure the money to buy the materials and meet the payroll, they would understand what it means to individualize package goods. Simplification and standardization of packages will eliminate thousands of people from the glass industry and packers of food products. The many thousands of dollars now invested in molds for making glass would all be cast aside. New molds would necessarily have to be made and with the shortages of metals, the necessity of securing priorities on such materials and the fact that the metals are not available nor die makers to make the molds, it is questionable whether or not any simplification or standardization program could be developed until long after the war has ended and then we would have no use for it. This plan would permit anybody to jam anything in a bottle they cared to, and we would have to accept it. Now we know what we are buying from the package and label.

The Congress of the United States, representing the people, certainly ought to have the right to determine whether or not we are going to revolutionize our economic life by permitting the bureaucrats to step in and take over the various food-packing businesses which have taken the lifetime of individuals to build, Trade names that are known throughout the world would be cast out to satisfy the ambitions of the bureaucrats who are anxious to control and regiment business and industry.

At this time it should be an all-out effort to win the war and such proposals as are now being made would do no good, hinder the war effort and only cause additional confliction and confusion to the food industry which now has plenty of headaches to absorb, and millions of dollars now invested by the food-packing industry would be lost.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, some years ago, for reasons which are quite beyond my ken, we passed the so-called silver purchase acts, which require our Government to purchase all the newly mined silver in this country, amounting to approximately 60,000 ounces a year, sometimes going as high as 70,000 ounces. Under these acts payment must be made in the amount of 71 cents per ounce, although the world price of silver may vary from 35 to 40 cents an ounce. Today, for example, the Treasury offers only 35 cents for foreign silver.

The situation with reference to the required purchase of that silver is becoming well-nigh intolerable. As a result of these yearly purchases, there has been built up a stock pile of silver in the enormous amount of 2,800,000,000 ounces, all of which is stored on the banks of the Hudson at West Point, N. Y. About 1,500,000,000 ounces are used to secure silver certificates and the balance, of 1,300,000,000 ounces is so-called free silver. This silver is sorely needed by industry, but by virtue of the silver purchase acts silver is sacrosanct and cannot be purchased and used in industry like copper or nickel or brass.

Science has told us in recent years of the great uses to which silver may be put. It has wondrous chemical and metallurgical uses. Yet silver is a "sacred cow," just as sacred as in the days of William Jennings Bryan. It is an obelisk, as it were, that we have built to false gods. This silver cannot be touched. It is sacrosanct. Let us remove the halo from silver.

Although we need silver badly in war industries we cannot open the vaults at West Point to use it in the war effort. Thus we suffer in the midst of plenty. The Government must continue to pay 71 cents an ounce for the useless silver that is being added to this useless stock pile year after year.

I think it is time to get mad about silver. I have the highest regard personally for the Representatives of the so-called Silver States, but it is only because of the machinations of these gentlemen from Idaho, Montana, Utah, Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada that this intolerable situation has come about. We seem to be helpless.

Frankly, we do not seem able to do a bloomin' thing about it, and that is a rather strong term to use, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] says, "Oh, oh," when I make that remark.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, that was merely approval.

Mr. CELLER. I am very glad that it was approval, but legislation was held up in another distinguished body because gentlemen from those States said they would not allow any business to be conducted if there was the slightest possibility of certain legislation introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island being considered and possibly passed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I gather from the gentleman's remarks that he thinks that the Silver Purchase Act should be repealed.

Mr. CELLER. I think those acts should be completely wiped off the books, dumped overboard, lock, stock, and barrel.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I wish the gentleman would have helped me in 1935 and 1936 when I introduced a bill for that purpose.

Mr. CELLER. I do not know why the House was so purblind, and I include myself in that regard, when the bill came forward. We probably did not realize the repercussions and the far-reaching consequences of that silver legislation when we first put it on the statute books, but I think the day of reckoning has come, and we must surely take stock and repeal those asinine acts, because they help only about 60,000 people, or 1½ percent of the silver States' population, and just about one twenty-fifth of 1 percent of our entire population.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Is the gentleman not aware that ample quantities of silver have been released, so that there is no freezing in the industry?

Mr. CELLER. No, indeed. "Ample" is not the word. It is a mere trickle that is being allowed for the war effort, and under what conditions? To get around the Silver Purchase Act restrictions, the Treasury lend-leases it to industry, but then only for limited purposes, namely, as bus bars. Frankly, in my humble opinion, the Treasury Department, in lend-leasing to war industry—lend-leasing, mind you—is violating the statute. They have no more right to take that silver out of the vaults at West Point than I have the right to take it out. At the Treasury they bypass the statute, and they have unlawfully—though I approve the effort—taken that silver and used it as indicated in war industry. So I say to my good friend, why must the Treasury Department use such subterfuge? That seems to me intolerable, and we must give the Treasury Department the right to do this thing honestly and to put it in another way, we must make "honest women" of the Treasury Department and repeal the statutes.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Just let me finish my statement. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee, stated last year and stated again this year:

> As far as I am concerned, I would be glad to see Congress strike the silver legislation off the books.

And our distinguished chairman of the subcommittee on the Treasury Department appropriation bill said this:

> If our rubber and aluminum are held in a hole in the ground or piled up in stocks in some great warehouse, it would not do the country any good, and I do not see any difference with respect to silver, for it should now be made available for war purposes.

I reecho his sentiments. Silver should be made available for war purposes. The War Production Board wrote me recently:

> Silver is now replacing tin in solder.

It is also used, so I am informed by the War Production Board, in engine bearings, and to save tin where tin is used in the bearing alloy. Silver also is used as a substitute for copper. The principal substitution of silver for copper is in bus bars, and they say further:

> In the electrical field, silver and silver alloy also replace copper and other metals for such uses as circuit-interruption devices, commutator segments, contact switches, wiring in fractional horsepower motors, etc.

Further, they inform me that silver in a sense replaces copper in brazing alloys, and copper-zinc alloys containing silver are now needed in which the silver content varies from 5 to 80 percent. Further, they speak of silver as a substitute for nickel and as a substitute for antimony and a substitute for aluminum, and that silver could be used in lieu of sheet or foil aluminum because of its malleability, corrosive resistance, and high reflectivity.

Mr. Chairman, silver is thus a war material of great importance in the manufacture of implements for submarines, tanks, planes, torpedoes, bombs, and antiaircraft guns. Yet the silver bloc refuses to relax its hold. Silver is a slacker metal. Let us put it to work and make it fight. It is time to get mad about silver.

The Treasury has agreed to loan to industries through the Defense Plant Corporation 497,000,000 ounces. This is being done by way of so-called lend-lease. Lend-lease was devised for the benefit of our allies for the purpose of sending food, supplies, and matériel to England, Russia, China, Australia, and so forth. It certainly was never intended to cover silver stock.

By another arrangement with the Defense Plant Corporation whatever silver is used in war industries must be returned to the Treasury after the war. How in thunder it can be returned is beyond me. According with the arrangements made with the Defense Plant Corporation, the silver may not be used up. It may not become part of the produce of the war production plant. It may be used only in such form as permits its return to the Treasury after the war. It can, thus, only be used as a substitute for copper in electrical bus bars—bars carrying all the current produced by a powerful electric source. The use is thus very limited, though, as I pointed out, silver has an almost unlimited usage in the arts and sciences and in war industries.

So restricted and limited is the use to which the Treasury can put silver that between April last, when the silver lend-lease program was announced, and September 11 there has been turned over to the Defense Plant Corporation and other users only 162,000,000 ounces, or 12 percent of the amount of free silver—1,300,000,000 ounces. And besides there is the currency silver amounting to 1,500,000,000 ounces.

The silver Representatives remind us of the silver assigned for use in industry. See what a mere drip that amount is and see how absurdly restricted the use is.

Remember also that the Treasury Department is forbidden to sell the silver it has been buying at less than $1.29 an ounce. Where are the buyers at $1.29 per ounce, especially with the Treasury itself offering 35 cents for foreign silver? Does not the whole business seem ridiculous?

The Treasury has more silver than it knows what to do with. Yet, industry is badly in need of the silver and the Treasury cannot sell it to industry. It is a most uncomfortable situation and cries to high Heaven for remedy.

The aforesaid use is practically limited to bus bars. The silver cannot be industrialized and used as in solder or in many other ways in which silver can now be used, such as, a substitute for tin, brass, copper, aluminum, antimony, and so forth.

> Imagine a stack of silver dollars as tall as the Washington Monument—

Says Herbert Bratten, formerly silver expert of the United States Treasury—> and then imagine about 65,000 such stacks, each 555 feet high * * * that will give you some idea of how much "untouchable" silver this country holds under lock and key.

It is high time that we wiped the silver statutes completely off the books.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], for inspiring the House to adopt the resolution authorizing the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee to investigate just what is happening to certain phases of our domestic economy. I am glad he mentioned paper production and I hope the newspapers of the country, and magazines also, will become interested in what any such investigation will develop in connection with their business. This angle is of vital importance to this House if we are to save the American way of life.

We all know, of course, that the administration has started curtailing the use of all kinds of paper and there are persistent reports that the initial curtailment step on printing paper was just a beginning. More drastic reductions are at hand unless we move very quickly along the lines indicated by the purpose of the Halleck resolution. I hope we will be able to expedite its passage for unless something is done, and done quickly, the bureaucrats will have dealt the paper-producing industry of this country a death blow. I doubt if many of the newspapers of the country are aware of this.

The foundation on which paper production is built is, of course, fiber and by all odds wood is the most important source of fiber supply. I have been making a quiet survey of men engaged in the production of wood and paper and I can best illustrate what is happening by telling you the story of one typical operation in northern Michigan. This little operation multiplied many, many times gives the American people the cultural papers used in our newspapers and magazines. This operator was doing selective cutting on land that had been logged over twice since 1900, the present cutting being the third crop on the same land. As I said, it was a small operation producing about 2,000 cords. At the beginning of this season the operator who has other timber interests was not going to cut this year, but then decided that it was a better policy to go ahead and keep busy his foreman and certain other keymen who are used the year round at forestry work on other property. Arrangements were made with a paper mill at a certain price which was an advance over the previous year and that would just about offset increased labor costs.

Then, as this operation was well under way, the O. P. A. came through with ceiling prices on the pulpwood, bringing them down to approximately what was received the year before. When that happened roads had been already cut and a good deal of preliminary work done so that the inevitable loss was just about the same whether operations were continued or abandoned. But the net result is that this operator this year is losing at least half of the value of the timber itself and he tells me that under no circumstances would he plan on operating next year. This illustrates how the effects of this Washington bureau's rulings and regulations are not felt immediately, but they do result in ultimate disintegration of a working organization, dispersal of equipment and consequent inability to resume operations once the damage has been done.

I ask you to multiply that many, many times and you have a quick picture of what is happening in the production of wood fibers.

I do not believe we can reclaim lost ground, but it is my firm belief that this Congress should demand that certain policies be changed before the publications of the country are ordered to cut back production to a level that will make it unsound for them to continue in business.

I would certainly urge that the House committee, when the Halleck resolution is adopted, go right to the very bottom of this paper situation, for I understand it is O. P. A.'s intention to extend the ceiling prices now in effect in the Lake States to New England. Incidentally, I have some information about the tactics being used by the O. P. A. in the New England area. According to the Commercial Bulletin of Boston some 85 lumbermen from New England met in Boston last December to hear O. P. A. representatives outline price schedules for the producers. One Harry Eckstein, speaking as the O. P. A.'s softwood executive, announced that the press was welcome, but its representatives were forbidden to report the meeting. The reason given for this arbitrary action was the danger of inaccuracy.

This extraordinary pronouncement—

to the press in regard to a public industry meeting which reporters trained in the lumber business were covering, is in our opinion, the last word in dictatorial unreasonable action.

H. A. Lindenberg, lumber editor of the Commercial Bulletin, protested to the O. P. A. in Washington, but Mr. Eckstein remains on the pay roll. I respectfully draw this matter to the attention of Senator Brown who might as well reconcile himself to discharging several thousand Ecksteins if he intends to improve the administration of O. P. A.

Now while I am talking about New England, here is another interesting observation which came to me recently in the form of a quotation from a letter to a Member of the other body, Senator TRUMAN:

New England is overrun with Government supervision employees wholly devoid of any of the requirements now necessary in their respective positions.

New England is also filled with Government forest and timber salvage employees, still drawing breath and pay, years after the hurricane that created their jobs—now sinecures.

You Members of the House will recall that several years ago we appropriated a considerable amount of money to salvage and clean up a large amount of timber that had been knocked down in a severe hurricane which covered a considerable area in New England. Then the letter goes on:

One, with several years' service in the territory, attending a meeting of small sawmill owners, when requested by the chairman for his suggestions, said he had come to learn what were the problems and needs of the sawmill owner.

There is considerable manpower in almost every New England community not gainfully employed. Office of Price Administration is reported to have over 50,000 employees; one-fifth that number gifted with common sense would certainly effect much more efficient administration. A reputable New England lumber producer reports a recent visit to the Office of Price Administration offices in Washington, requesting of the top executive some corrective measures, and receiving this answer: "To h—— with New England lumber manufacturers." The New England lumber producer requires no brief assuring his respect for high office or his loyalty to his Government but the Congress may judge as to how much longer he will endure indifference and incompetence, yoked with coercion, before adopting the slogan, "To h—— and Boston Harbor, with orders of confusion, ceiling, incompetence, and inefficiency."

Now, gentlemen, just how much longer are we in this House going to continue to tolerate on the Government pay rolls men who adopt the attitude of this man Eckstein? Just how much longer are we going to permit these autocratic, dictatorial bureaucrats to continue to insult the American people openly or by means of asinine rulings? Personally, I have the highest regard for the integrity and the ability of our former colleague, Senator Prentiss Brown, and I fondly hope that Senator Brown will put an end to such actions in the O. P. A. and will immediately clean house of this man Eckstein and all of his type and will see to it that, in the future, men are assigned to responsible policy-making jobs in his organization who at least have some working knowledge of the particular problem they are tackling. If not, they ought to be men who are at least big enough to go to recognized authorities in the industry, or in the various localities affected, and learn from them the true picture of the situation before further wildcat and hamstringing regulations are issued. I hope this will be done, but if it is not done after a reasonable time, then it is up to us in the Congress to act—and act definitely.

I am not so certain that there may not be much more behind this curtailment of newsprint paper than presently appears on the surface. There are many of us in this country who are sincerely worried about our continued trends toward collectivism in this country—or call it totalitarianism, if you will. One of the first steps in the establishment of a dictatorship in a country, or dictatorship by bureaucracy, if you please, is by obtaining full and complete control of the avenues of communication and information in a country. We have witnessed many trends in the past toward this very thing and this is possibly just another step in the same direction. Because if the bureaucrats do succeed in so drastically curtailing the size of our large daily newspapers, these newspapers will of necessity not have sufficient space left with which to earn their bread and butter through advertising—which of necessity already has been drastically curtailed. Indeed, these newspapers will not have sufficient space left to cover the news fully and completely. In such a case, the result must inevitably be that the newspapers would have to seek a subsidy from the Government, and subsidy from the Government will, of course, mean that they will be completely and wholly subservient to the Government and they will then be even more drastically curtailed or censored in the dissemination of factual and unbiased news to the American people. These were the tactics adopted by Hitler, by Mussolini, and all the dictators of the past. We must not permit it to happen in this country. We must not under any circumstances permit the little weekly newspaper publisher—the man who, of necessity, generally buys his newsprint on a hand-to-mouth basis—to be put out of business. That would be a calamity second only to the complete stifling of the larger and smaller dailies.

To me it is not entirely inconceivable that some of these superworld planners might not be behind this effort to destroy the free press of America. Of all these post-war superworld planners, the Socialists and the Communists are the most frank, and we have plenty of them down here in bureaucratic Washington. These "crackpots" make no pretense of beating around the bush. They openly state that they are dedicated to the establishment of a new order when this war is over in which private enterprise will be abolished. As a matter of fact, they are not even ready to wait for the war to be won, but consider that the war itself is their great and golden opportunity to permanently fasten collectivism on America. This proposed rationing of newsprint paper may be entirely necessary. I do not know. But one thing is certain, if we curtail the freedom of the press in America, we are playing right into the hands of these "crackpots" and they know it full well. It is up to this Congress, operating under this Halleck resolution, or some similar measure, to get at the facts in all these rationing standardization and regimentation programs. We ought to be more fully informed of the need for those things. If they are needed to win the war, I will be the last to object to them. The American people are taking them in their stride, but we better be ready to account to the American people for our laxity if we do not satisfy ourselves that they are absolutely necessary for the winning of the war and that they are not a part of some one of these "crackpot" schemes or devilishly planned schemes to do away with what we like to call the American way of life.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE. I appreciate the statement the gentleman has made and I am glad he has set himself to cleaning up this situation in the paper industry. I have had some experience in this field in contacting the agencies here. A line should be drawn between the O. P. A. people who are setting up these quotas and issuing some of these regulations and the people who are expected to administer them in the War Production Board. I have found a very fine understanding of the printing and publishing business in the office of the Chief of that Branch, William Chandler. I find, however, that they are circumscribed and limited by unintelligent allotments and the unintelligent rules that have been set up by the O. P. A.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. I am informed that the newspaper editors of the country, whether dailies or weeklies, are smothered by an avalanche of Government propaganda hand-outs, accompanied by urgent requests that all of those things be printed in the interest of public morale. Does not the gentleman think that a great deal of this scrap paper which comes from almost every Government department might well be curtailed?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. There is no question about that. There are thousands of people in Washington lying awake nights trying to think of some excuse for their jobs, and that is what they resort to. Whenever I am fortunate enough to return to my district and have the opportunity to visit the various newspaper editors back home, they complain about this very thing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania mentioned. They tell me they literally receive tons of this junk year after year, of which they could not print one-tenth if they owned a printing establishment several times as large as they now use to get out their weekly and small daily papers.

If this administration would handle the manpower and price situation intelligently, we could meet the present situation without such tremendous upheavals in our domestic economy. And if we do not bring about a change, we are not carrying out the instructions we received from the voters in November. Coming from the pulp-producing area in Michigan, I hope the Halleck resolution will be adopted and that a thorough and complete investigation of the paper-producing situation will be approached with vigor and determination to do something about it. I would recommend that one of the first steps would be to invite other Congressmen from timber-producing States, for most of us know the situation at first hand and know that it is being hopelessly muddled by someone. If it is the determination of this administration to reduce the Washington Star, the Times-Herald, the Post, or News to a four-page publication, and put most of the newspapers and magazines out of business, we might as well know about it at once, for I am sure the Congress can, should, and will do something about it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER].

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I heartily endorse the demand of my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] that the Congress do something at once to meet the acute situation in connection with paper production. I understand from very reliable sources that certain elements in this administration are talking about cutting the consumption of printing paper, newsprint as well as book stock, down to about 50 percent of 1942 consumption. I want to see the men who are doing this planning and scheming questioned by a committee of the House.

Because some of our most publicized tourists to Great Britain found the newspapers in England practically driven into bankruptcy because of the war is no reason at all for anyone wishing a like fate to the press of the United States. There is a vast difference between England and this country in this regard. England's imports of printing paper were cut off from the Scandinavian countries and were either replaced by armaments from this continent or reduced to a trickle because of Axis submarines. In this country and in Canada any water haul involved in moving printing paper from mills to consumer is on inland waterways.

The excuse for very drastic curtailment of paper production is directly traceable to the hopeless bungling of the manpower problem and the peculiar mental gymnastics by which O. P. A. establishes price ceilings. I am not so sure that some of this bungling has not been designed for the purpose of wrecking the American press. I believe the problem is altogether too serious to permit the dreamers in O. P. A. or Civilian Supply, aided by the extremists in the War Department, who seem determined to wreck our civilian economy, to have their way. It is a responsibility of the Congress and an obligation of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to demand that this erratic program be halted and everyone connected with it compelled to explain what they are trying to do to us.

Reports reach us that the program is all cut and dried. Usually well-informed trade papers indicate that drastic curtailments are to follow the one already made. Unless we stop it, we must share some of the responsibility for the vast majority of newspapers and magazines in this country going bankrupt. You cannot block the production of fibers for a year or two and expect the industry to live on its fat. There are no reserves; and if our press is to be maintained, it must have somewhat near a normal supply of paper. A break in production for one year will have terrific impact for several years.

Just because we see evidence of prosperity in the volume of advertising carried by big metropolitan newspapers, such as we see in Washington or are published in New York, does not mean that the press elsewhere is equally prosperous. Curtailment of civilian goods has brought on a shrinkage in advertising. Any of us can verify this by talking to a few of the publishers in our home districts. They are in difficulty. Permit this unwise program to continue to its ultimate goal, and you will see many of them suspend publication. It is time for us to act. The Halleck amendment should be adopted without delay.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the Selective Service System announced new regulations under which the dependency deferments will be abolished, for all practical purposes. It is true that the new regulations affect certain designated occupations. However, this is the beginning; it is the entering wedge. Those announced cover only some occupations which quite evidently do not contribute to the war. Obviously, this was intentionally done. It is the program that the Selective Service System has apparently long sought to place into effect. Once this is done, the dependency deferment has gone for all time.

In October we had before us the amendment to the Selective Service Act permitting the calling of 18- and 19-year-old boys to the service. As it left this House it contained a provision that married men, men with families, would not be called until single men and men without families within their State had been exhausted. It met with practically unanimous support in the House, but, unfortunately, went out either in the Senate or in conference.

Let us get the matter clear. Nobody objects to taking every man in the United States, single or married, yes, and women and children also, if necessary to win this war. That is definite and no one argues with it. On the other hand, we find that our War Manpower Commission has until this good day formulated no program for the utilization of our existing manpower—we had Mr. McNutt before the Military Affairs Committee all morning yesterday and learned that he has no program formulated. We find that there is no program for the substitution of over-age or physically disqualified, or the use of women. We know that the addition of another 8-hour day in our defense factories would increase the available man-hours one-fifth, or 20 percent, although it would not increase labor to that extent.

Captain Rickenbacker has stated that absenteeism in our defense plants runs to the extent of 10 percent. We know there is inefficiency and that all of these plants are overstaffed. We are engaged in fighting a war to maintain our institutions. We will maintain such institutions as organized labor, if you please, and I will go along with that; the 40-hour week in peacetime—and I go along with that. I say to you we have another institution in this Nation, and I think that is the one that my boys from Texas are fighting for. I think it is the one that your boys are fighting for. That is the preservation of the family in American life.

Once you abolish this family relationship in the United States you have abolished our entire society. Then you have abolished everything that we believe to be worth fighting for in this Nation. Once you take the father of these children you send the mother off to work. Then you have deprived those children of the guiding hand of the mother and you have deprived them of the stern hand of discipline of the father. I say to you that we are on dangerous ground when we go so lightly into this program when we have done nothing to utilize the manpower that we do have available in the United States. It reflects the opinion that has existed in the Selective Service System all along.

We have been somewhat surprised; I have been shocked, and I have had many letters from ministers in this country who are very shocked indeed that the Selective Service System presumes to pass upon the reason for which a child may have been begotten. They attempt to pass upon whether a child is in existence for the purpose of avoiding military service in time of war. This gives an indication of what they had in their minds when they come with this program, although they have done nothing to carry out a manpower program.

I have contended from the beginning, when we first adopted the Selective Service Act in 1940, that it contained a fundamental defect. The quotas of local boards are fixed, not upon the number of registrants at the board, but upon the number registered and not deferred. The local board therefore has it within its power to reduce the number of soldiers which that board furnishes by being liberal with the deferments it grants. I have contended from the beginning that it was fundamentally defective and that it needed to be changed. No one in the department has been willing to evidence any interest in it. I am sorry to say I have been unable to get anything more than casual interest in the Military Affairs Committee or in the Congress.

I have in my possession figures showing deferments by occupation. One would suppose that the great industrial centers such as Michigan or Ohio would be the highest. The national average is 4.12 percent. This is industrial or occupational deferment. The State of Michigan with all of its industry is below the national average with 3.59 percent. The State of Ohio with its industry is below the national average with 3.76; while in the State of North Dakota, where I am sure you will find there are not many war industries, and I am sure I have heard some of the Members from North Dakota complain about it, there is 11.23 percent occupational deferment. In the State of Washington the occupational deferment is 9.1 percent; in the State of Idaho the occupational deferment is 8.73 percent. You cannot say it is because of agriculture, because that is not correct either.

Let us go to the State of Illinois, which has a combination of industry and agriculture. It is below the national average with 3.57 percent. Let us take the State of Indiana: It is below the national average with 3.49 percent; and then we will drop down to the South, to South Carolina with 1.99 percent occupational deferment. Texas, with the largest percentage of volunteers and the greatest agricultural and beef-producing State, has but 2.6 percent of occupational deferment.

There is a leakage in our manpower. It is within the power of the Selective Service System and the Manpower Commission to determine where that leakage is. I suggest this is where a portion of it will be found.

You will find in the case of dependency deferments, both with children and without children, variation between States almost as great as you find in the question of occupational deferment. The same is true of those deferred for mental, moral, and physical reasons. You will find that the percentages vary as much as they vary in the instances I have pointed out. This is something that challenges the attention of Congress. We must see to it that the manpower of this Nation is so used that we can protect the families of our citizens just as long as possible. I know of nothing that can challenge your attention any stronger than this. I have introduced as a bill the provision carried as an amendment to the 18-19-year-old draft. I am pressing for hearings before the committee, for time is short. We must act quickly in this situation to prevent this catastrophe which I regard as being unnecessary.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman in my opinion is one of the best informed men in the Congress on the whole proposition of selective service and its operation. I want to commend him for this statement. If he will bear with me may I suggest that in my opinion this is just another case of administrative flaunting of the plain intent and will of the Congress. Further, it is an attempt to do by indirection what those who have been charged with the formulating of a manpower program have for some reason failed to do by direction. In other words is it not true that during all these months that the Manpower Commission has been supposed to be formulating a program to bring about the effective use of the manpower of the Nation no real program has been brought forward?

Mr. KILDAY. May I say to the gentleman from Indiana that on yesterday, when the Chairman of the Manpower Commission was before the Military Affairs Committee, he was unable to give us any program on any of these questions.

Another thing, at the time the 18- and 19-year-old draft was before us the bill contained a provision that these boys would be permitted to complete their academic year. It was adopted here practically unanimously. It was in the bill as it left the House, but very quietly it was dropped out. I imagine it is good strategy for those attempting to eliminate such things to attract as little attention here as possible. They took it out in the quiet of the conference room.

The departments took the position that they had to have these 18- and 19-year-old boys. They had been demanding them since 1940, and yet there was not one scratch of a program for the utilization of the colleges of the country, not a scratch of a pen of a program to continue the supply of doctors, engineers, physicists, chemists, and clergymen, if you please. Your entire supply of priests, rabbis, and preachers is being cut off under that provision.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, the Navy now says frankly that they cannot use one of those in the college program until July 1943. The Army says that it hopes to use them in March, but I think they are entirely too optimistic. They are working hard to do it, but only a dribble will be here by the 1st of July. Had my provision remained in that bill under which they could have completed their academic year, they would still be in school and we would have that much of their education and preparation for service in the war effort. Instead of that, those kids left the day we passed that law.

Mr. HALLECK. Does not the gentleman think that a matter of this great consequence ought to be approached in an orderly way and that if we are going to say to a married man with dependents that we are going to require that he go from the job he now has to another job, we ought to meet that head on? If anything is to be done, should not the Manpower Commission and its directors come up here with some such proposal, rather than to distort the Selective Service Act that was designed solely to bring people into the military service? Is this not an attempt to do by indirection what they have not proposed directly?

Mr. KILDAY. I agree with the gentleman. We are at fault, and I mean collectively, in turning over too much power to certain people, as the gentleman spoke about a while ago. That is what we have done, and, as a result, we have a Government by decree.

Mr. O'HARA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. O'HARA. The gentleman has spoken about the effect of the 18- and 19-year-olds being drafted. I am wondering, in connection with the talk which we have heard in the newspapers about a further educational program, about what is going to happen when we have a situation where these boys are taken in. They will be sent back to the colleges. What is going to happen to the colleges when those boys are sent out? How many of those colleges will be operating?

Mr. KILDAY. No one can tell.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLEVENGER].

THE FEDERAL WAR MANPOWER TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Chairman, it is vital that the Congress formulate at this time a clear, unified policy with reference to training of workers for the war industries. There is a manpower shortage in the skilled trades. In order to meet production goals this year, large numbers of partly trained youth will be required for shops and factories; other workers must receive advanced training. Seven Federal agencies are engaged in the Federal training program, including the United States Office of Education and the National Youth Administration. These agencies are under the direction of the United States Manpower Commission.

One of these agencies—the National Youth Administration—was established in 1935 as part of the W. P. A. to provide work relief and employment for needy youth. In 1939, industrial training was added to the program. The N. Y. A. has received about $700,000,000 since 1935, including $53,000,000 for defense training and $8,000,000 for student aid in the current fiscal year. In July 1941 the average enrollment was 281,000; in November 1942 it was 53,000. The decline was due to improved employment and Army recruitment.

For the fiscal year 1942 we appropriated for N. Y. A. $154,795,000; of this amount $63,028,000 went for industrial defense training. For the current fiscal year we appropriated $61,274,000 for this agency. With the exception of $8,000,000 for student aid, this sum is allotted to preemployment training for youths of 16 to 24 years of age for the war industries. The N. Y. A. maintains 38,879 training stations or machines in use throughout the country. Courses are planned to run from 6 to 8 weeks. If there is an average of 53,000 students for each course, turned over 6 times a year, this means that some 318,000 youths would receive N. Y. A. training annually. Students are paid hourly rates for this work.

Many students have been drafted so the N. Y. A. is now training girls. On November 25 last there were 28,300 boys and 25,000 girls on the rolls. In 14 States there are more machines available than trainees. This means a very low rate of use per station. There are 37 States which have 17,655 stations not in use. The N. Y. A. has spent $28,117,576 for equipment of which $19,247,212 was bought in fiscal 1941. There are 1,700 N. Y. A. shops located in 700 training centers throughout the country. The average cost per month for resident youth is $77.80; for nonresident youth $59.34.

In October 1942 the N. Y. A. had 11,762 paid employees in the administrative personnel to train 53,000 youths or 1 to every 4½ trainees. Among these employees were 4,771 shop supervisors; 3,143 in management and service activities; 900 administrative employees; 854 in maintenance, transportation, and care of property, and 2,094 in subsistence activities.

Leading educational organizations are alarmed at attempts to make N. Y. A. a continuing agency because they think it duplicates the program of the United States Office of Education and suggests the beginning of national bureaucratic control of education. They cite the fact that $1,000,000,000 has been invested in regular school plants for industrial training and that there are adequate instructors and facilities to train 750,000 more workers as of a year ago. For the current fiscal year, the Office of Education is receiving $109,000,000 for industrial war training, which is similar to that of N. Y. A. The Office of Education use their equipment on an average so that two or three trainees per day use the machines. They have 56,053 stations giving training similar to the N. Y. A. program. During a day they train 85,915 in preemployment courses and 43,005 in supplementary courses, a total of 128,920 persons on these stations.

There is no doubt of the need of the war industries for hundreds of thousands of trained or partly trained new workers this year. We have an enoromus production program and manpower is limited. The Congress should see to it that all industrial war training is unified to these ends:

First. That every available training station or machine is in constant use.

Second. That administrative and supervisory staffs are consolidated for maximum efficiency at minimum cost.

Third. That all training given by the Government be strictly adjusted to the needs of the war industries so that every trainee can be immediately placed in war work when his training period is completed.

Fourth. That the N. Y. A. be abolished and its equipment be placed where it can be most effectively used by the Training Division of the War Manpower Commission.

Under the War Manpower Commission the following agencies are offering training and related services to employers and employees in war industries:

First. Training Within Industry Service.

Second. Apprentice and Training Service.

Third. Vocational Training for War Production Workers.

Fourth. Vocational Training for Rural War Production Workers.

Fifth. Engineering, Science, and Management War Training.

Sixth. National Youth Administration Program.

Seventh. United States Employment Service.

This program is designed for the following types of war workers:

First. Production operators.

Second. Skilled production specialists.

Third. All-round skilled mechanics.

Fourth. Engineers, chemists, physicists.

Fifth. Plant administrative and production supervisory personnel.

Sixth. Trainers and supervisors of training.

The program also covers preemployment training for war industries and agriculture for the following kinds of workers:

First. Production operators.

Second. Engineers, chemists, and physicists.

Third. Trainers for teachers.

Fourth. Trainers in labor relations.

The Congress should determine to what extent the War Manpower Commission has become another superagency in the training field, designed to create more Federal jobs and further expand our overloaded, overlapping bureaucracy; also the extent to which it has unified the various training programs into a coherent, efficient manpower plan for war production schedules.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

THE PROPOSED FLORIDA BARGE CANAL

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, recently the item which would give the go-ahead signal to the Florida barge canal project was supposedly killed when it was removed from an appropriation bill. But like the famous reported demise of Mark Twain, the suggested death of this measure may have been exaggerated or at least premature.

Fearful that this multimillion-dollar nonessential may be merely in a state of suspended animation, it seems pertinent, at this time, to review briefly the facts in order to waylay any Ocanala ghosts which might consider this a proper moment for reincarnation. To do this, it will be necessary to state the problem, to show how the proposed canal does not alleviate that problem, and then to indicate what can be done to meet the needs of the situation.

The problem, as everyone knows, is the urgent need for petroleum products on the eastern seaboard in order to relieve gasoline and fuel shortages. It is estimated that over 1,300,000 barrels per day of crude oil, fuel oil, and gasoline are required to relieve the pressure in this area. Of this amount, some 1,100,000 barrels a day may be delivered by railroads and pipe lines. The deficit must be made up by other methods.

To mitigate this need, a Florida barge canal has been proposed along the route of the defunct $250,000,000 ship canal. This new pork bill was shaved from the $250,000,000 figure to the comparatively modest sum of from $44,000,000 to $100,000,000. Estimates vary, and some even go beyond that. It would, on completion, ostensibly allow barges to carry northward 466,000 barrels of petroleum daily, enough when added to other available means, to alleviate the present shortage.

However, there is more than one fly in the ointment. The eastern seaboard needs fuel oil now. It needs gasoline now. Yet the proposed canal, on the basis of studies made by the only responsible people who would know, will take a minimum of 3 years to complete. There has been some loose talking lately to the effect that the canal can be completed in a year or 15 months, but Major General Reybold, Chief of Engineers in the War Department, who is the authority for the 3-year estimate, has refuted this. He has done this moreover, in the face of constant attempts by the proponents of the bill to have him lower this estimate. As a matter of fact his estimate was made against the advice of his own staff who would have added another 6 months to the total—making it 3½ years. And all this was on the supposition that three shifts would be run a day, that priorities would be secured, and that there would be a reasonably easy flow of material, equipment, and manpower. Three and one-half years for a canal, yet the East needs petroleum now. Nor is he alone in this belief. Mr. J. R. Porter, of the Office of Petroleum Coordinator for War, has concurred with the Engineering Department to the extent that his study has led him to conclude that the new canal could not be completed in time to facilitate meeting the east-coast petroleum shortage.

Disregarding time, there are other insurmountable difficulties. One is lack of material—steel, iron, and rubber. It was estimated that the rubber used on bulldozers and tractors would put tires on every car in Florida for the duration. It was stated by the Office of Petroleum Coordinator for War that even were the proposed canal to make available the 400,000 barrels of oil needed daily, still, from the standpoint of steel efficiency it would not be justified because of the enormous horsepower involved. Maj. Gen. T. M. Robbins, Assistant Chief of Engineers, told the House Appropriations Committee that materials, equipment, and manpower shortage made building the canal improbable at this time.

The manpower necessary to build this proposed canal itself poses an almost insurmountable problem, taking as it will engineers, technicians, and laborers from sorely needed places in American industry. Despite this, according to the Tampa Morning Tribune, a well-known Senator from Florida on hearing that it would take several thousand men 4 years to build the canal, urged that several hundred thousand be employed to complete it in 1 year. Meanwhile, Florida farmers appeal for labor to cultivate crops which lie spoiling in the fields. Meanwhile draft officials in Florida, forced to defer farming and forestry key workers, hear that 20,000 more workers are required to maintain Florida farm production near normal. Meanwhile the State Department, the War Manpower Commission, and the immigration authorities study a proposal to import Bahama islanders to supply agricultural labor for Florida. Meanwhile the Farm Security Administration is attempting to recruit a mobile land army to save the sugar, citrus, and garden farms of Florida. Little wonder that Army engineers recommended that no funds be provided for the "chasm, which has split the State of Florida."

Then there is the cost of this canal to the taxpayers of the Nation. Major General Reybold estimates it at $44,000,000. Other estimates run much higher. The Florida Taxpayers Association fears that maintenance alone might cost a million dollars a year. The cost in money, men, and materials would be formidable in peacetime. It becomes a national affront in wartime to urge this useless ditch on a people straining every available muscle in prosecution of the war effort.

Particularly is this true when one views the alternatives, for there are alternatives. These involve the use of practical, available means of transportation today, not by waiting from 36 to 42 months for the first drop of oil.

In the first place, as has been proposed, a set of temporary pipe lines across Florida could shuttle petroleum from the Gulf of Mexico to barges waiting to carry it to New York on the inland waterway. It is estimated that these pipe lines—three of them would cost $10,000,000—would carry up to 120,000 barrels of petroleum daily. The advantages of this project are so apparent that even the Ocanala dreamers dare not object to it. In fact, they have all stated the necessity for these lines in lieu of the early completion of the canal.

In the second place, supplementing this there is available another Florida canal, now in use at the moment, from Fort Myers, on the Gulf of Mexico, to Stuart, on the Atlantic inland waterway. The Government has expended $25,000,000 on that canal. Why the proponents of the barge canal disregard this available canal one cannot say. Perhaps it is because repairs on the southern canal will cost only $208,000, as compared to a minimum of $44,000,000 to dig the more northern route. Perhaps it is because tugboats will take 4 days longer from Texas to New York by this route—4 days instead of 3 or 4 years. Perhaps it is because both Army and Navy are solidly in back of its construction, although they do not look upon the northern waterway as feasible at this time. Perhaps it is because the southern canal will not require the manpower, the steel, the machinery to put into operation that the other will.

Whatever the reason, there is a canal available, not in 3 years, but now. According to Rear Admiral Huttle, who, it will be remembered, made a test trip by tug and barge over its course, there is no reason why the waterway should not be used to capacity for deliveries from the Gulf to the Atlantic. Should this be done, it is estimated that from 288,000 to 300,000 barrels a day may be shipped by this route. That amount, plus the petroleum carried by pipe line, would relieve the east-coast shortage.

Army engineers have recommended at a cost of $3,000,000 continuation of the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway to Fort Myers, the western outlet of the existing canal. Were this to be completed, a safe and protected inland waterway would be provided all the way from Texas to Trenton, N. J., whether or not we even have this second barge canal.

Needless to say the proposed barge canal should die from lack of sustenance. The food which its ravenous maw would devour—that is, time, manpower, materials and money—the very nourishment so badly needed to build the sinews of war, should be allowed to remain in use to the Nation. It should not be expended for a post-war question mark.

In my opinion a majority of the people of Florida do not want this canal. The taxpayers of the United States do not want this canal. The Office of Petroleum Coordinator for War does not want it. The Army, the Navy, do not want it. Yet attempts have been made—and may be made again—to foist on the American people in time of war the building of this second canal, this duplicating ditch, this so-called short cut that will take 3 years before the first tug could navigate it.

This proposed canal authorization should die. It should die despite the hysterical arguments of its sponsors. Lacking plausible reasons for encouraging such a fiasco at this time, the advocates of the canal have even descended to using childlike reasoning. "If we go ahead and authorize the building of this canal," they say, "it will be a help in the propaganda to show the Nazis and the Japs that we actually mean to win." "Help in the propaganda." Ask the Office of War Information which they would rather have—$44,000,000 in war material or a Florida barge canal. No doubt the Nazis and Japs would agree that we should immediately throw ourselves frantically into this enervating activity.

The proponents of this bill disregard the apparent fact that efficient use of the suggested pipe line and of the existing canal would solve the problem of fuel for the East. They evidently would rather have for their forty-four to one hundred millions a Florida barge canal on paper, than 176 to 400 Flying Fortresses in the air.

The time has come when we must clearly register our disapproval of this pork-barrel measure. It is neither practical nor essential and is intended as a door opener for the Florida ship canal. We must repeal the authorization approved in the last Congress. I propose that we remove this threat to our war effort. The people expect this Congress to stop all unnecessary and nonessential spending. Let us remember we are at war—total war. I have introduced a bill to repeal the authorization for the Florida barge canal in the hope of saving $44,000,000 for vital war necessities.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak to the House this afternoon, but having just listened to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, perhaps I should. He has so incompletely given you the picture of the Florida barge canal matter until I feel that perhaps you should have other and correct information concerning it. Therefore, for the sake of the record and for your information, there are two or three things of which you should now be advised.

The House Rivers and Harbors Committee, of which I am a member, has from time to time held hearings on a Florida canal. First hearings and first reports by the committee were for a ship canal across north Florida connecting the Atlantic with the Gulf. Last spring, however, owing to the war emergency, this committee gave consideration to a proposal for a barge canal across north Florida to link the existing barge canal channel of the Atlantic coast with that of the Gulf of Mexico coast. This channel now extends from lower Texas to Trenton, N. J., with the exception of completion of a small necessary link across north Florida. Your committee had extensive hearings of departmental officials, private individuals, and organizations. The Army engineers, the Oil Coordinator's office, and other Government departments were heard before the committee.

General Reybold, Chief of the Army Engineers, told the committee that the barge canal could be completed in 2 years. Other engineering authority, extremely competent, indicated it could be completed in probably a year. It is my understanding that Gen. B. Somervell has indicated it could be constructed in a year. He has not told me this, but I understand he has told others this. He is the most competent man of all to speak concerning this project, because he conducted for the Army Engineers exhaustive surveys and findings concerning it. Gen. Charles P. Summerall, former Chief of Staff, United States Army, and a gentleman and soldier and engineer most extraordinary, I understand has recently said he knows the barge canal can be completed in less than 12 months.

All of the departmental witnesses appearing before our committee said that they desired the canal constructed and desired it now, in the interest of the war effort. They also said that completion of this barge canal was the best hope for, and practically the only hope for relief of the oil shortage which then occurred, and has now been intensified in the East Atlantic States. They said it offered practically the sole medium of assurance of conveying to the eastern war manufacturing plants sulphur, oil, zinc, lead, and other essential war manufacturing materials. On June 17, 1942, and after exhaustive debate, the House of Representatives approved by a splendid majority roll-call vote authorization of the project. A few weeks later it was approved by the Senate and signed by the President. I cannot understand why anyone now who is cooperating for the war effort can have the effrontery to undertake to repeal this authorization and to block appropriations for this all-essential war effort.

I am advised that you are now paying a million dollars a day to transport to our factories materials which this canal would carry if opened. I am further reliably advised that it is impossible to transport now, with existing facilities. war materials in adequate quantities and on time to our war plants. May I emphasize also that the War Production Board and the Office of Defense Transportation have urged immediate completion of this barge canal as war essential. Fuel oil scarcity is closing the schools of the East, closing necessary industrial war production, and even causing worshipers to sit in cold churches. The northeast section of our country now shivers in cold, damp houses and looks out on the snow and ice because this barge canal has not been completed. You gentlemen who have obstructed it and obstructed appropriations for it should think well as to whether or not you are responsible for your portion of this misery, lack of production, and loss of lives in battle which is now occurring.

And may I warn you now that if construction were started on this canal tomorrow, fuel oil, gasoline, sulphur, and all war essentials in adequate supply and quantity would, before December 15, 1943, traverse this canal and actually be delivered to the eastern seaboard of our country.

And mark my word, if you do not agree to an appropriation for this canal now and its immediate beginning, the misery now suffered in the northeast of our country will stagger into insignificance in comparison with that of 1 year from now. You can remedy this situation and I call on you as patriotic Americans to cooperate with the war effort and give the East fuel oil, gasoline, sulfur, salt, zinc, timber, and other war essentials which exist primarily in the Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana area. The same forces which have always fought waterway improvements and fought the canal in Florida are now fighting this. I cannot for the life of me see why they should, because this is a barge canal and for war purposes. Had this canal been in existence since hostilities in this war began, an enormous amount of tonnage and the lives of merchant crews would have been saved. I do not feel at liberty to mention the amount of these losses. But that is water over the dam. You can now remedy it by making this war auxiliary available by next December. The propaganda to the effect that this barge canal construction will take farm labor is hooey. The fact is it will require dredge and drag line operators and only a few of them. This farm labor scarcity bugaboo is a demagogic smoke screen thrown up to try to breed prejudice. It shows the great extreme to which those who are opposed to this war effort may go.

You can keep labor on the farms only by paying them a decent price for their produce. You cannot expect them to continue to produce corn, cotton, potatoes, peanuts, beef, pork, peas, vegetables, oranges, grapefruit, and other crops and fruits unless they can make at least a small profit. What they need and must have is a higher selling price at the farm for their produce.

Certain influences opposing this war effort may make high exaggerated statements. You may even hear it will take 10 years to build this little 20-mile-long 12-foot-deep ditch. You may hear it will require $300,000,000; that it is a boondoggling project; that the war officials do not desire it; that no one whomsoever desires it. But my colleagues, may I remind you that sinister influences have opposed practically every war effort which this Congress has advanced over the past 3 years. I warn you not to be misled but to support the war effort, and in this give needed material and fuel for our war factories of the East and fuel for the homes, schools, and dry automobile tanks of the East. When you obstruct completion of this project, you obstruct the production of airplanes, necessary naval vessels, Maritime Commission vessels, guns, ammunition—and yes, you even obstruct the delivery of necessary airplane and motor-vehicle fuel with which we must hope to defeat the Axis in actual battle.

What are you going to do about it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The language and the logic of my friend from Michigan flow about as fluently as the oil will flow through that canal when we get it. If you were permitted to hear only his side of the case you might be convinced that this is a fool boondoggling project. But you are going to hear the other side and I am going to help you hear it. I invite you to listen tomorrow to Judge MANSFIELD, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, who had charge of this bill in the House when it was passed.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman from Michigan points out the great advantage of pipe lines, and he says also that the Chief of Engineers states it will take 3 years to dig this canal. I do not want to embarrass any engineer or anyone else in the War Department, but I can get an opinion from the War Department that this canal could be constructed and have barges going through it within a year's time. If we had started that canal when we authorized its construction last July, we would have relief for next winter.

The gentleman does not answer the fact that in my speech the other day I said that I had in my records a guaranty by one of the most prominent construction concerns in the United States. Nobody can question their ability, because they have already done $200,000,000 worth of work for the Army engineers. They guaranteed that they with three other contractors would finish this canal within 10 months, so that the barges could be going through it. We forget one thing. When the gentleman speaks of 3 years, he speaks of the completion of this project as set forth in the bill. That does not have to be done to get oil through there. You can get a channel through there in much less time.

Further, I say to the gentleman, when he speaks of essential materials, about these things, and the need of bombers, that these bombers may run dry unless we get fuel for them. Furthermore, when he speaks of essential materials, this bill specifically authorizes the engineers to use temporary structures, and I say that the pipe line that we are putting across Florida already has used as much essential material as it would take to build that canal. The pipe line running from Texas to Illinois has taken 10 times as much essential materials, and I challenge the gentleman to come to Florida and take a census of the opinion of the people down there. He says the people of Florida are against it. I do not care how he takes his poll, but I challenge him to come down there and he will find that not more than 15 percent are against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I did not know that this discussion would take place today. In order to keep the record straight, I call attention to the fact that the first time that this measure was up for consideration it was defeated, and the second time it was considered it was passed by only 12 votes. In reply to my friend the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN], who told us that a number of the administrative officials here in Washington spoke in favor of the project, all I need to do is to call attention to the fact that these same officials spoke for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project, and called attention to the imperative need of this waterway as a war measure. However, a short time thereafter the President recalled the project and indicated that it was not necessary, and it has been as dead as a dodo bird ever since.

Admiral Halsey said that the Japs can be licked in 1 year, and he said that they can be licked by supplying materials—planes, ships, and so forth. It seems to me more important to provide Admiral Halsey and our Pacific command with tools to lick the Japs than it is to build this ditch which is a smoke screen for the Florida ship canal. I say "amen" to the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO]. I am glad that it has not been started. I am sure that we can divert this money to far better use by supplying things that our soldiers need in the Pacific with which to lick the Japs.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. On the question of time, the only authority that I have is the record of General Reibold, who appeared before the committee, and his testimony that this canal would take 3 years to build if everything went well. If the general, or any other engineer, has revised his testimony, I am not so informed; but we have the right to take the word of the Army engineers who come before the Rivers and Harbors Committee on every project that goes before it, and we should depend upon their testimony.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest on Monday afternoon to the able address of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] and later read it with some care as it is recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Many of the sentiments expressed by the gentleman must be enthusiastically approved by every patriotic American. I agree with him, and I feel sure, with the majority of the House, that it is intolerable that various agencies of the Federal Government should employ in responsible positions men and women of professed communistic beliefs. Our Bill of Rights has given great latitude to the expression of political sentiment, even the most radical sentiment, but surely it is not necessary, in order to preserve civil liberties, that we elevate into responsible Government positions those who would by a class revolution destroy our fabric of political and economic life or those who place above their loyalty to America their loyalty to Marxism or to that country which has adopted Marxism as its official faith. If these men cited by the gentleman from Texas espouse such revolutionary doctrines as their writings and speeches would indicate, I agree with the gentleman that they should be summarily discharged from Federal employment.

Likewise, I hold no brief for those extremists who, because they disapprove of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] and the methods of his committee, have labeled him as an agent of Hitler, as a Nazi, or a Fascist.

I think it is absurd to accuse any citizen of the United States—much less an elected Member of Congress—with a lack of patriotism or subversive intentions because of political, economic, or philosophical opposition to any of his ideas. I think that it is a fair assumption as well as the only workable basis for the solution of our parliamentary differences that all Members of this body, no matter how opposed their views, are working sincerely for what they believe to be the welfare of their country and are representing, as they understand them, the sentiments of their constituents.

But I hold it to be equally unfair that patriotic Americans of liberal or even extreme views who are willing to abide by the decision of the majority and abide by constitutional methods should, because of these views, be damned as Communists.

In his dissent to the majority report of the committee headed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] aptly points out the difference between those who are subversive and those whose views do not agree with those of the majority. He says that the present tendency in America for so-called right wingers to shout Communist at liberals is doing America no good. It is dangerous as it associates in the public mind those words Fascist and Communist, not with those to whom they can properly be applied but with persons "whose patriotic devotion to America and her basic institutions cannot be questioned, whatever the feeling of their political opponents toward their particular views on particular subjects may be."

Let us then dispense with name calling and try to conduct our future discussions of this matter without the usual emotionalism and with a decent regard for facts.

I cannot discuss all the organizations or individuals or publications referred to in the address made by the gentleman from Texas. I do not have the knowledge as to the truth or falsity of these charges which would justify me in consuming the time of the House. I intend to speak of that which I know, to confine myself to matters within my personal knowledge or based upon sources which I believe to be reliable. I can safely state that in his accusations against the organization known as Citizens for Victory the gentleman from Texas has been inaccurate in his statement of facts and unfair in his indiscriminate grouping of this association with other organizations allegedly communistic without taking the trouble to differentiate between them or to inform the House that Citizens for Victory is as free of communism as the American Legion and the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Before discussing his address and before letting in a little light to dispel the confusion and suspicion toward this group, which the Members must have carried home from his remarks, I would like as briefly as I can to discuss the organization itself, its antecedents, its purposes, and its membership.

One of the greatest battles of ideas which has ever been waged in America took place between two contending schools of political thought in the year and a half before Pearl Harbor. As Hitler's conquests transformed the map of Europe and as Japan threatened to run berserk in the Pacific, many patriotic citizens, both in and out of public life, saw the shadow of the war fall across America. They urged that America, as yet inactive, take steps to build up her defense and to aid those countries who still stood between the might of the aggressors and our own safety. Outstanding among those who urged these measures of protection was our President and many of our leaders in both Houses. On the other hand, a strong minority in the House and Senate felt that we should withdraw more closely into ourselves, and should cease any international activity which might involve us in the conflict. The contentions between these two philosophies provided the material for a debate in the Halls of Congress which is now history, and which is too recent to necessitate a discussion at length. Echoing throughout the land were the reverberations of this debate. Everywhere public-spirited men took sides, associations were formed. Little Americans known as isolationists had their America First Committee, which held public meetings throughout the country. Addresses were given at these meetings by Members of Congress and by others who shared their views. Those who felt that this war was very much our business; that we must act promptly if we should avoid the fate of France, Poland, and the other countries of Europe; united in the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies; and later in the Fight for Freedom Committee. These two last-named committees likewise held public meetings.

Public officials, clergymen, representatives of the press, outstanding businessmen, all of whom saw the imminent peril of inaction, strove to awaken the country to the danger which confronted it. These latter two committees might be called the parents of the Citizens for Victory Committee, which has been assailed by the gentleman from Texas, for, although there was no formal merger of the Committee To Aid the Allies and the Fight for Freedom Committee into the new Citizens for Victory Committee, many of those active in the two former committees prior to Pearl Harbor formed in the main the nucleus of Citizens for Victory. Before meetings held by the parent committees spoke such outstanding Americans as Rev. Henry Hobson, bishop of the Episcopal diocese of southern Ohio, who was the head of the Fight for Freedom Committee; Wendell Willkie, at a mass meeting in New York; Maj. George Fielding Eliot, outstanding military commentator; Senator Ernest Gibson, of Vermont, later the national chairman of the Committee To Defend America; Senator Claude Pepper, of Florida; Mayor LaGuardia, of New York; and many business and industrial leaders from the ranks of both labor and management.

Upon the outbreak of war the conflict between the so-called isolationists and so-called interventionists was resolved. Our attitude toward the World War was decided for us by the Japanese attack at Pearl Harbor. But many of those who had been active to awakening America to the sense of its danger realized the fact that their task was not completed. Everyone wanted to win the war, but, after victory, what would come next? They realized that, although Hitler and the Japanese war leaders were the actors and the aggressors in this conflict, that the attacked nations were not without fault. They had by their suspicion and extreme nationalism set the stage for the success of the Axis Powers. They had demonstrated that the jealousies and mistrust between nations which prevent them uniting against a common aggressor provide a fertile field for selfish, well-armed robber nations to dispose of them piecemeal and at will.

These men remembered the debacle following the last war, when the might and wealth of America, thrown into Europe at the time of the crisis, determined the outcome of the war. They remembered that after victory the American soldiers marched home again, leaving the problems which had precipitated the war unsettled. They remembered that President Wilson pleaded for international cooperation as the only method of avoiding future conflict. They could not forget that America was deaf to his warnings; that, tired of war and foreign involvements, deluded by a false sense of security and self-sufficiency, we decided to let Europe go hang and tend to our own knitting. We saw the reflection of our individualism in the nationalism of every capital of the world, until finally war clouds loomed again and the countries once allies were now too far apart and suspicious of one another to band together to dispel them. When war came they formed the Citizens for Victory, determined that this hideous mistake should not be again committed. They banded together into an organization which sought to influence public opinion by education and which supported candidates for national office whom they felt, either because of their political professions or their past records, would work for maximum cooperation for a total victory and a permanent and just peace. By doing this they felt that they were doing their best to prevent a recurrence of a Third World War.

The membership of the Citizens for Victory Committee is in no sense politically partisan. It is composed of members of both political parties.

It is in no sense an internationalist organization except that it believes that a sovereign America must make and keep peace with other sovereign nations of the world.

It is in no sense an organization devoted to the destruction of the legislative body of our Government nor to the promotion of bureaucratic control.

It never, as was charged, attacked the majority of the Members of Congress but, on the other hand, published and disseminated its ideals and purposes and circulated the voting records upon important bills of those seeking reelection.

It is in no sense a communistic organization but rather a typical cross section of America. Among the members of its executive committee and honorary vice chairmen are such well known Americans as Rev. Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, executive secretary of the Church Peace Union and a member of the Federal Council of Churches; Douglas Auchincloss, associated with Time, Life, and Fortune magazines; Col. Henry Breckenridge, formerly Assistant Secretary of War; Ellsworth Bunker, president of National Sugar Refining Co.; Walter Millis of the editorial staff of the New York Herald Tribune; William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor; Chester Rowell, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle; W. W. Waymack, editor of Des Moines Register and Recorder; William Allen White, editor of the Emporia Gazette, who may be called the dean of American newspapermen.

These men are not communists. Their opposition to the Axis commenced neither when Russia was invaded nor when Pearl Harbor was attacked. They have always been anti-Axis.

Now, to discuss details, Clark M. Eichelberger is not the directing genius of any purge groups as is charged, but he is executive director of the League of Nations Association. Incidentally, he has not been identified with Citizens for Victory since August 1942.

The next innuendo in the address of the gentleman from Texas concerns Frederick C. McKee, treasurer of Citizens for Victory. I have known Mr. McKee well for several years. The slur upon his name concerns me personally and it has largely prompted me to publish this refutation. Frederick C. McKee is one of the leading citizens of Pittsburgh. He represents the ideal of a man whose practical business sense has placed him in a prominent position in our business life, yet whose concern for the public welfare and unselfish devotion to his country consumes a large portion of his time and takes him away from his livelihood. I did not know until recently whether Mr. McKee was a Democrat or a Republican. I have known ever since I have had the privilege of his acquaintance that he is in the highest sense patriotic and devoted to the future of his country. I, personally, have been in accord with his convictions as to America's place in the world. They are substantially the same that are held by our President and our able Secretary of State, among others of the Democratic Party and they are similar to those held by Governor Stassen, Wendell Willkie and many prominent Republicans, including one of my own friends from Pittsburgh, James H. Duff, the newly appointed Attorney General of Pennsylvania. You may disagree with his convictions and you may do so honestly, but you cannot doubt their sincerity or his unselfishness. Some sarcasm can be noted in the gentleman's address in his statement that Mr. McKee is treasurer of the National Casket Co., which he is. The gentleman likewise says that he is secretary of this company. This is not true. I do not think it is disparaging to a man's patriotism that he is an official of a successful business concern. Neither do I think that success in business justified an inference of un-Americanism or communistic leanings. I do not think that many Members of the House will think the less of Mr. McKee for his business connections with a reputable and well-known industry.

The gentleman states that Jay Lovestone is one of the highest paid officials of the Citizens for Victory Committee and that he was formerly secretary to the Communist Party in the United States. Mr. Lovestone is not an official but an employee of the labor division of the Citizens for Victory. He was a Communist. He severed his affiliation 14 years ago and has since been outstanding in his hostility to communistic principles. It is interesting to compare his case with that of J. B. Matthews, research director of the Dies committee. Mr. Matthews was a party worker for the Communists until 1935. This is verified in his own book, The Autobiography of a Fellow Traveller. By his own admission his life until 1935 was largely devoted to the promotion of Communist front organizations.

The gentleman is again in error when he states that most of the officials who made up the Citizens for Victory are also in the Union for Democratic Action. There are 36 members of the executive board and honorary vice presidents in the Citizens for Victory. Only 1 of these who had never been active in Citizens for Victory, is also a member of the Union for Democratic Action.

To repeat, Citizens for Victory does not wish to discredit Congress nor to hamper it. It seeks only a total victory over the enemy in this war and a lasting peace after the war.

The gentleman from Texas quotes from the New York Herald Tribune a full page advertisement headed "Help stop votes for Hitler."

I have read the insertion and there is no suggestion therein that any Member of Congress sympathizes with Hitler or wishes him to be victorious. Citizens for Victory was of the opinion that every vote, no matter how pure and praiseworthy its motive, that was cast against preparedness, against lend-lease, and against fullest cooperation with our allies to win a total victory was a vote cast which helped Hitler. As I said before, you may disagree with these principles but there is nothing in them which suggests a discrediting of the United States Congress or an attempt to establish either communism or bureaucracy in the United States.

I think that I have shown that in many instances the gentleman from Texas incorrectly stated the facts. What I am concerned with more than these misstatements is the more insidious effect which the gentleman achieved by including a praiseworthy and patriotic organization together with other allegedly communistic organizations without attempting to differentiate between them in the minds of his listeners. The gentleman cited several Federal employees whom he accuses of communistic utterances. He cited several public groups and publications that he accuses of communistic tendencies. He also discusses Citizens for Victory without, it is true, making any direct accusation of communism against this organization, but with the inevitable effect of linking Citizens for Victory with the other groups.

No one could listen to the gentleman's address without carrying away the idea that Citizens for Victory was, if not communistic, "pinkish" and very radical. This innuendo is unfair to decent, patriotic, responsible American citizens, and I think that the gentleman from Texas, one of the most persuasive orators of the House, has sufficient knowledge of the effect of his rhetoric upon his listeners that he should have been scrupulous in avoiding this imputation. I do not know whether his other statements are accurate. I suspect that some may not be. I do not choose to discuss them, as I stated in the beginning, because I do not have the facts to either controvert his charges or support them. I will, however, scrutinize very carefully these statements in view of his rash and intemperate remarks about Citizens for Victory.

The gentleman complains about intolerance in this country as manifested against those of southern birth. I can assure the gentleman and also the Members of this House I certainly have no such prejudice or ill feeling. Toward those from the South whom I have had the privilege of friendship I have the highest esteem and the warmest affection. As to others with whom I have but a speaking acquaintance, I might say that there is no group of people in this country for whose honor and patriotism I have a higher regard than I have for our southern Representatives.

When the votes were being counted prior to Pearl Harbor upon issues whose decision affected the safety of the entire world and the future of our own country, it was to the votes of these southern Members that America must feel grateful for assuring to us a foreign policy of honor, bravery, and international decency. I shall never forget the part that was played in the House by these gentlemen from the South. But I wish to state at this time that while the South was united for aid to the democracies we had no such union in the North and that the men who now compose the Citizens for Victory fought valiantly in our northern cities for the same cause which was supported almost to a man by the southern Members of the House.

I feel a debt of gratitude likewise to Citizens for Victory for their share in preserving our civilization. It is for this reason that I take the floor today to repel this imputation of un-Americanism, of hostility to Congress, of communistic leanings which have been made against this worthy group.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. McCORMACK having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COURTNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 1648, the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, 1944, had come to no resolution thereon.

TO AMEND THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (H. Res. 99) for printing in the RECORD:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to amend the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, to permit consolidations and mergers of domestic telegraph carriers, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

(By unanimous consent, Mr. PLOESER was granted permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

PERSONAL PLEDGES

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, as I step for the first time into the Well of this assembly, there comes to me quite naturally a feeling of elation. That feeling, however, is tempered by one of gratitude and responsibility—gratitude to the people of my district who, through their confidence and support, made it possible for me to be here; and responsibility to the people of my Nation to carry on the ideals and principles of this great Government of ours—principles, many of which were laid down by men who once stood in this very Chamber, men who have long since passed to their reward, but men whose words and deeds shall ever be woven as golden threads in the fabric of American history.

We wonder as to the type of men who founded this Government of ours. So let us press aside for a moment that mysterious veil of yesterday and gaze backward down those long corridors of time into a dim and almost forgotten past. Let us parade upon the field of recollection those gallant men and women who gave their all that you and I might be a free and independent people. As they pass in review, those men who once stood in this Hall where we now stand, we are brought to the realization that you and I can take but little credit for what America is today. America of tomorrow is our problem. The law of life decrees that the torch of progress shall slip from the palsied fingers of age to be caught and borne aloft by the supple strength of youth, ever onward, ever upward, ever seeking to improve, that our America of tomorrow shall be greater than our America of today.

America is great not because of its mighty mountains, its beautiful rivers, its silent valleys, but rather it is great because it mattered not to the founding fathers of this great free land of ours whether they were merchant, prince, or laborer—their hopes and ambitions for their children were the same. The goal in life which the pioneer set for himself and because of lack of opportunity or lack of education he failed to attain, he wanted to see attained by his children, and there was no sacrifice too great for the pioneer dad and mother to make in their efforts to extend to their children the educational and other advantages which in so many instances they themselves were denied. Their hopes were in their children, and today history repeats, for again the future of America rests upon youthful shoulders; even as you and I assemble here, American sons, your sons and mine, are fighting upon the world's far-flung battlefields, fighting to preserve the liberties created within these very halls, fighting to preserve the liberties for which their forefathers died, while American daughters are filling many of the posts in munitions and other vital industries left vacant by American sons now on the battlefields.

A few short months ago those boys were with us. They are the same boys who were taught by American mothers to look toward heaven with smiling, trusting faces as the place from whence all blessings came, but today those boys look toward heaven with apprehension and anger, for from the heavens come bombers that rain death and destruction on them as they march through war's flaming hell.

We in America had prayed that war would never again come to this great free land of ours, for when we older folks think of war we remember 1917. It seems but yesterday that we stood in awed silence as Old Glory passed, held aloft by those stalwart sons of America. We heard the roll of drums and the echoing tramp of millions of marching feet as the legions of America marched off to war. We remember that the sky above our cities glowed red with the reflected fury of mighty blast furnaces as they poured liquid molten metal into flasks and molds casting munitions of war. We remember that the very earth beneath our feet trembled with each driving smash of mighty trip hammers as the forges of America wrought guns and armaments for American troops. We remember that then, as today, the men and women on the farms worked from dawn to dusk to provide the food for our soldiers, and that down in the pits the miners worked long, weary hours wresting from mother earth the metals and coal so vital to the success of our troops. We remember the armistice and how the Nation, wild with joy, welcomed our returning soldiers, but folks, they did not all return, and today in America there are more than 100,000 dads and mothers whose hearts are heavy, for down through the years there comes to each of them the memory of a tousled-headed baby boy that once crawled across their kitchen floor. They remember him when he was just tall enough to stand on tiptoe and reach on the table and grasp at his daddy's pipe. They remember how they toddled him on their knee and taught him to love his country and to revere its flag and the things for which it stood. They remember how he came home in the evening from the little school and excitedly told of the lessons in history and of the patriots who had gone beyond. They remember how proud they were as he marched away in uniform, and they remember the telegram that came from their Government telling them that he would never again return, for their boy sleeps today and until eternity beneath a whited cross upon the battlefields of France.

He laid his life upon the altar of democracy in a war which he was told was to end all wars. He gave his life upon the battlefields of Europe, where the hatred of the classes of divided people have flared incessantly since the dawn of history. Today millions of American boys are following in that boy's footsteps, boys who are being told again that they are fighting a war to end all wars. The responsibility for those boys is upon our shoulders, even as it rested upon the shoulders of Congress a quarter of a century ago and a century and a half ago.

The spirits of American statesmen hover over this assembly, and by reviewing their lives we find a pattern that shapes our own destiny. They were men of action, men of honor, and men whose every act was motivated by the love of liberty and of country. They were men who were taught by American mothers at the family hearthstone that America was a land of opportunity and that no height was too great for any American to reach. They were men who were taught that individual initiative and a willingness to work would overcome all things and that sweat was the only cure for economic ills. They were men who were taught that public office was a public trust, that the Supreme Court was akin to holy and that the Constitution of the United States was sacred and should be held inviolate by every true American, no matter how high or how low his station in life.

Those men have passed forever. The curtain of time has forever closed the portals of their tombs. The mantle of authority has been transferred from their shoulders to yours and mine. Our duty is to carry on and preserve the type of government that made America great, the type of government that permitted the progress which during 150 years has placed America upon the pinnacle of world domination; the type of government built by incentive, ingenuity, and initiative; the type of government built by men who hewed an empire from a wilderness and who realized that nothing of any value was ever produced that was not the result of the sweat and toil of men's hands.

In acknowledgment of this duty I accept my portion of that responsibility and dedicate my efforts as a Member in Congress toward the preservation of the ideals of these revered statesmen, and to them as an American, standing where they once stood, I make the following pledge:

First. I pledge that I shall dedicate my efforts toward the saving of the "four freedoms" in this Nation before I attempt to guarantee them to the entire world.

Second. I pledge that I shall not permit the shimmering mirage of the Atlantic Charter to dim the brilliance of our own charter—the Constitution of these United States.

Third. I pledge that I shall oppose any additional grants of congressional power being removed from the Congress, as I would consider such action an open admission on my part that I did not feel competent to perform the duties of the office to which I was elected.

Fourth. I pledge that I shall support the proposed plan of building an army of 10,000,000 men only when it is proved that such an army would not place our Nation in the condition of the steamboat in Abe Lincoln's famous story which carried a whistle so large that each time they blew the whistle it used all the steam and stopped the boat.

Fifth. I pledge that I shall investigate the equity of our expenditure of $97,000,000,000 for the war effort in 1943 as against $21,000,000,000 expenditure by England during the same period, and shall base my final action upon my findings as to the respective ability to pay.

Sixth. I pledge that in voting funds for lend-lease I shall bear in mind the statement of Winston Churchill, who said, "I have not become the King's First Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire," and would inform him that neither do I intend, as a Member of this Congress, to bring about through bankruptcy the dissolution of these United States.

Seventh. I pledge that I shall check carefully all post-war plans which tend to create a fanciful Utopia among all nations, as history has taught us that in Europe the classes of divided people have fought incessantly since the dawn of history and will, in my opinion, continue until the end of time.

Eighth. I pledge that I shall endeavor to be tolerant at all times and shall support, without partisan bias, any measure I deem beneficial to public interest, regardless of its sponsorship, and by the same token shall oppose any legislation submitted by any bloc or clique, whether agricultural, industrial, or labor, that I do not consider to be for the best interest of a majority of the people.

Ninth. I pledge that I shall support only that tax legislation which is based upon the ability to pay and not that which is based on the idea of preventing the public from having money and shall oppose any measure masquerading under the pretext of sopping up surplus income to prevent inflation, as I consider such measures nothing more nor less than a deliberate and subtle attempt to bankrupt American individuals and American business.

Tenth. I pledge that I shall support any equitable agricultural program that does not advocate reduction or scarcity, as the law of economics has ever taught us that you cannot get something for nothing, and America must never go hungry.

Eleventh. I pledge that I shall not expand, by my vote, Government control of business, as I frankly believe that America is great today not because of Federal restrictions and regulations imposed upon business, but because of the 150 years of freedom enjoyed by American enterprise.

Twelfth. I pledge that I shall not support any legislation the intention of which, in my opinion, is to destroy business through taxation but shall vote to permit business to retain sufficient funds to meet adversities, ever bearing in mind the wisdom of the age-old story of the 7 fat years and the 7 lean ones.

Thirteenth. I pledge that I shall pursue a course dictated by my honest convictions, fully realizing that independent thought and action on the part of any public official is a badge that marks him as a target for the slimy pen of every demagogue with whom he disagrees.

Fourteenth. I pledge that when the war is won and the peace is ours I shall work tirelessly to remove from American business and the American public every shackle of Government control imposed upon them during the war period, so that our country and its people may return to normalcy and resume its march of progress which during 150 years has placed our country on the pinnacle of world domination.

Mr. Speaker, to this type of government, a government perpetuated by the consent of the governed, I pledge my feeble and untiring efforts, and as an American I ask only that history record of me that I had but one prayer—that this Government of ours, this great citadel of freedom, may stand forever as living, throbbing proof that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" has not perished from this earth.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. GROSS, for the remainder of the week, on account of official business.

To Mr. McGREGOR (at the request of Mr. BROWN of Ohio), for 1 week, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BURCHILL of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, February 4, 1943, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1943

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who committest to us the swift and solemn trust of life, so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Consecrate with Thy presence the way our feet may go and the humblest work will shine and the roughest places be made plain.

Help us to be valiant pilgrims on life's dusty and dreary way, mindful of the fret and jar which any words or deeds of ours may bring to fellow travelers by our side. Deliver us from unlovely self-conceit. Make us forgiving and forbearing, gentle with others' failings and grateful for others' favors, remembering that the time for loving and serving is so short as the night cometh and swift to its close ebbs out life's little day. Teach us to toil and ask not for reward save that of knowing we do the things that please Thee. So upon our passing days may there rest the benediction of a faith that dares, a love that cares, and a service that shares, until by Thy grace we find ourselves by hands familiar welcomed into the Father's house, Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 1, 1943, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

OPERATIONS UNDER FUNDS APPROPRIATED TO THE WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION BY EMERGENCY RELIEF APPROPRIATION ACTS, 1942 AND 1943

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by the provisions of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1943, I present herewith a report of the operations under funds appropriated to the Federal Works Agency, Work Projects Administration, by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts, fiscal years 1942 and 1943, to the end of the calendar year 1942.

This report is supplemental to that portion of the report presented by me to the Congress on January 11, 1943, which is related to operations to the end of the fiscal year 1942 under funds appropriated to the Work Projects Administration by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts of 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, and for fiscal years 1941 and 1942.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 30, 1943.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report giving all of the facts and pertinent provisions of law in the cases of 234 aliens whose deportation he suspended for more than 6 months, together with a statement of the reason for such suspensions (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Immigration.

REIMBURSEMENT OF CIVILIAN PERSONNEL FOR PERSONAL PROPERTY LOST INCIDENT TO EMERGENCY EVACUATION OF UNITED STATES ANTARCTIC SERVICE EXPEDITION'S EAST BASE, ANTARCTICA

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for the reimbursement of certain civilian personnel for personal property lost incident to the emergency evacuation of the United States Antarctic Service Expedition's East Base, Antarctica, on March 21, 1941, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF BOARD OF INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH IN THE FIELD OF TRANSPORTATION

A letter from the chairman and members of the Board of Investigation and Research, Washington, D. C., stating that circumstances had delayed completion of its study and report on interterritorial freight rates and that the report will be submitted at a later date; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

IDA F. BRAUN ET AL. AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 270 (75th Cong.), a certified copy of the findings of fact, conclusion of law, and opinion in the case of Ida F. Braun, Alice Braun Menges, and Carl J. Braun, individually, and as executors of the estate of Hedgwig W. Braun, deceased, and as legatees and beneficiaries of the will of Hedwig W. Braun, deceased, and as sole parties in interest by succession under the last will and testament of Herman W. Braun, deceased, versus the United States, Congressional No. 17749 (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE—PETITION OF JOHN RANDOLPH NEAL

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of John Randolph Neal, Knox County, Tenn., praying that the Senate allow him to contest the election of TOM STEWART to the office of United States Senator and to produce proof substantiating the various charges and allegations made in the petition; that TOM STEWART be not allowed to hold the office of United States Senator, but that the petitioner, John Randolph Neal, be declared rightfully entitled to such office, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the city of St. Louis, Mo., favoring the enactment of pending legislation for the preservation of the home of George Washington Carver as a national shrine; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Military Affairs:

"Whereas war and world conditions have placed upon all industries a great challenge, involving maximum production to meet the needs of our armed forces and those of our allies; and

"Whereas the production of food is of the greatest importance, and because of depleted manpower on our farms, lack of farm machinery, unfavorable priority rulings, and inability to compete in labor markets, agriculture is unable to meet the demands now made upon it;

"Therefore we respectfully submit the following facts setting forth the position of agriculture:

"(1) Milk, butter, cheese, meat, poultry, and vegetables are vital war foods of which there is now a shortage;

"(2) These are the foods which require a comparatively large amount of manpower in man-hours of work to produce;

"(3) They require skilled labor on a year-round basis as contrasted to peak harvest time and seasonal demands;

"(4) The manpower on the farms of Minnesota has already been seriously depleted;

"(a) Thousands of men have gone into our armed forces;

"(b) A considerable number of Minnesota farm laborers have gone into defense industries;

"(c) This transition of labor has been brought on in part by the prevailing high wages and overtime paid in these defense industries;

"(d) Farmers cannot compete with the prevailing high wages thus paid;

"(e) This automatically results in shortage of farm labor as well as a reduction in manpower hours for the Nation as a whole;

"(5) Since we are collectively engaged in a common struggle of winning the war, we urge that we share the sacrifices of the soldiers at the front, by foregoing special privileges whether we be laborers in the war industries or producers on the farms; that our loyalty and patriotism should find expression in a willingness to work longer hours, to the end that production may be intensified and the war quickly won;

"(6) Inasmuch as farm labor must be experienced and specialized, the general solution of the farm labor problem, therefore, can partially be solved by the release of men from our armed forces and defense industries who are experienced in farm labor;

"(7) The farm-labor problem can be further solved by release of essential farm machinery, repairs, and repairing material, which is a direct step toward replacing necessary man-hours on the farm. Much of the red tape now required by the Government at Washington should be eliminated and more authority delegated to the local agencies to handle these problems;

"(8) Electricity being a fundamental factor in increasing production on our farms, we urge that the War Production Board modify existing regulations that will permit the use of materials supplying electricity to farmers along existing lines;

"The above analysis of our farm problems coupled with a profound desire to do everything in our power to aid our Government in promoting policies most urgent to achieve victory in war, and after the war, to aid in reconstruction, prompts the Legislature of the State of Minnesota to urgently resolve that the Congress of the United States give immediate attention to these most pressing problems involving agriculture as well as the well-being of our entire Nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we earnestly petition the President and Congress of the United States and all other national agencies concerned, to immediately correct these existing conditions as set forth in this resolution, adversely affecting agriculture in Minnesota, and thus hampering our efforts to sustain our Nation with food supplies; be it further

"Resolved, That we do earnestly petition the President and Congress of the United States specifically to bring to the attention of the War Manpower Commission and Selective Service the existing plight of agriculture, to the end that the present policies of these agencies be immediately modified so as to prevent further depletion of skilled farm labor and the consequent impairment of necessary food supply."

By Mr. CAPPER:

A petition, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of Hardtner, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit liquor sales and to suppress vice in the vicinity of military camps and naval establishments; ordered to lie on the table.

By Mr. CLARK of Idaho:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Finance:

"Whereas hospitalization has been provided for veterans of all wars regardless of origin or nature of the disability; and

"Whereas veterans discharged from the present world conflict are eligible to hospitalization only in the event they are discharged for disability incurred in line of duty or in receipt of pension for disability incurred in line of duty; and

"Whereas discharged veterans of the present conflict are being denied necessary immediate hospitalization because of the requirements of the present laws under which the Veterans' Administration now operates: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Idaho (the House of Representatives concurring), That we most respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States of America to take such action as is necessary and required to correct present inequities in Federal statutes pertaining to the hospitalization of war veterans to the end that a veteran of the present conflict discharged on or after December 7, 1941, be considered a veteran of a war and entitled to hospitalization for treatment as indicated or care of any disease or injury, regardless of the nature of origin, when such treatment is required; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to forward certified copies of this memorial to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Whereas the dehydration of Idaho potatoes on a large scale is essential in order to supply necessary food for our armed forces overseas; and

"Whereas the War Department is prohibited from purchasing dehydrated potatoes from any plant unless and until such plant is approved by the Joint Dehydration Committee of the Agricultural Marketing Administration; and

"Whereas the dehydration plant facilities in the State of Idaho are inadequate for processing all of the available supply of Idaho potatoes for such purposes; and

"Whereas said Joint Dehydration Committee of the Agricultural Marketing Administration has made an arbitrary and unjust ruling in which approval of any additional dehydration plants for the processing of Idaho potatoes is being withheld on the ground that the present plants are using as much of the total production of Idaho potatoes as such Committee deems proper to be diverted to that use, notwithstanding that there is an abundant supply of suitable potatoes available for such use and much time, effort, and expense have been put forth for the establishment of additional plants for processing such potatoes: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Idaho (the House of Representatives concurring), That we most respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States of America to immediately take such action as may be deemed necessary to broaden and liberalize the administration of the duties of the Federal Joint Dehydration Committee of the Agricultural Marketing Administration so as to permit the orderly establishment and development of dehydration plants and facilities in order that there may be an increased production of dehydrated potatoes, thus providing a more adequate supply of such product for our armed forces as well as developing a profitable market for Idaho potatoes and increasing the income of the growers of such potatoes and those who may be engaged in the work of processing the same; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to send copies of this memorial to the Honorable John Thomas, the Honorable D. Worth Clark, the Honorable Compton I. White, and the Honorable Henry Dworshak, members of the Idaho delegation in Congress assembled."

FARM MACHINERY—RESOLUTION OF NORTH DAKOTA LEGISLATURE

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I have in my hand a concurrent resolution which has been sent to me by the Legislature of North Dakota, and which, at their request, I read into the RECORD. It is as follows:

Whereas the farmers of North Dakota are preparing to cooperate in the war effort by planting the largest acreage of wartime crops in history; and

Whereas the farm machinery in this State is more than normally in need of repairs and replacement because during the decade of the thirties the financial condition of the farmers did not permit purchases and what crops were raised were used to pay debts, and with plenty of cheap labor available machinery was allowed to wear out, with the result that new machinery purchases in the State of North Dakota in 1937, 1938, and 1939 were less than 50 percent of new machinery sales in the State during the years 1927, 1928, and 1929; and

Whereas restrictions on sales during the past 2 years and the drafting of farm labor has created an urgent need for labor-saving machinery especially for cultivating, haying, and harvesting purposes; and

Whereas there is a shortage of blacksmiths and mechanics as well as welding materials and supplies; and

Whereas the manufacture and distribution of labor-saving farm machinery is a slow process; and

Whereas farmers of this State must have immediate information on the harvesting facilities that will be made available before they dare plant 1943 crops on the scale needed for winning the war: Be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota assembled at Bismarck that, Congress and the appropriate Federal agency and directors should take immediate action as follows:

1. That farm machinery manufacturers who are equipped to build and distribute large labor-saving farm machinery be immediately ordered to proceed to construct additional quantities of machinery, particularly the cultivating, haying, and harvesting types.

2. That the present program of accelerating the release of repairs and parts be continually stressed.

3. That the remaining blacksmiths and mechanics be allowed adequate iron, steel, and welding supplies and materials for repairing farm machinery.

4. That the farmers of North Dakota be given immediate, definite, and final assurance of just what they may depend upon in the way of machinery for 1943; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent immediately air mail to Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; Henry L. Wallace, Vice President; Donald L. Nelson, Chairman of the War Production Board; George L. Gillette, chairman of the Farm Equipment Machinery Division of the War Production Board; to the Secretary of Agriculture; and to the Senators and Congressmen from the State of North Dakota.

I ask that the concurrent resolution be referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

A DECLARATION OF WAR BY THE UNARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—PETITION

Mr. BROOKS. There has been presented to me by Mr. Edwin B. Moran, president of the Rotary Club of Chicago, a petition containing the signatures of 9,154 Chicago citizens. It is stated that other Rotary Clubs have secured hundreds of signatures. The Kiwanians of the United States have also obtained 50,000 additional signatures.

These signatures are not only those of Rotarians and Kiwanians as employers but those of many thousands of employees and executives, both men and women, who are not members of service club organizations. They are a cross section of citizens from labor, management, and the professions. They have all signed as citizens.

This petition and accompanying declaration is the idea of the son of a Chicago Rotarian. His father promised, when the lad left for war, that he would do what he could to keep the home fires burning toward maintaining the liberties of the American people. The ideas of his son and himself are embodied in "A Declaration of War by the Unarmed Forces of the United States of America."

I request that the petition or declaration be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and appropriately referred, because I believe the subject to be of importance to members of this body.

There being no objection, the petition or declaration was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

More than 2,000,000 American young men have gone to war. They have set aside their hopes and dreams. They have left comfortable homes. Postponed careers. Declared a moratorium on life.

Turned abruptly from the ways of peace—they are now digging ditches, building roads, peeling potatoes, swabbing decks, emptying garbage, drilling, training, learning to shoot. We may thank our lucky stars they don't have to learn to die. They are Americans. They just don't like being kicked around.

They went cheerfully—went where they were sent, and no questions asked. Rich and poor. Republicans and Democrats. Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Gentiles, white and colored. Wealth, position, religion, color, politics—these don't matter when the question is one of freedom or slavery.

There are no limitations on the hours these boys work now. No rules decide their pay. They've got a grim, tough job to do, and they're doing it like men.

They're learning things every day—these boys we say we cherish. Learning a lot of things we should know, but stupidly refuse to admit.

They're learning that courage alone is a thin weapon against Axis planes and tanks.

They're learning the tragedy of losing for want of a few extra bombers in the right place at the right time.

They're learning the brutal, bloody cost of haggling and arguing and debating and stalling while our sons die.

We stood on the curb as they left. We cheered. We went with them to the station and shed a few tears. We drove home in our cars to warm firesides. Then in a week or two we stormed the stores when the demand for cloth to clothe them removed the cuffs from our pants.

In God's name, America, let's be men at least as big as our sons.

We are the unarmed forces of the United States. No one of us is without responsibility or duty.

While we haggle over an hour of overtime our sons are being slaughtered.

We live our comfortable lives back of the ramparts they watch. If they fail, there will be no life, but slow, living death.

Our supreme duty—our only duty—is to deliver to these young men the planes, tanks, guns, and ships they need. Deliver them at top speed and work as many hours making them as they willingly work using them.

They are out there now. Waiting with the coming of each dawn. And for their courage, their bravery, their sacrifice, they've asked just one thing of us—"Don't let us down."

This is our unequivocal answer—we whose names appear below. We declare war. War on partisanship. War on all political intrigue. War on special privilege. War on blindness and bickering.

We demand that every citizen of the United States, in or out of Government, in or out of management, in or out of labor, shall exert every human effort toward the production of war munitions and supplies in maximum quantity at maximum speed and at minimum cost.

As a sacred duty to our armed forces and to the Government and the people, we, the unarmed forces, declare war on all swollen salaries, dividends, bonus payments, or profits on war contracts for munitions or supplies in excess of profits made in peacetime under conditions of full and free competition. And we demand full and detailed public exposure of all violations.

We declare war on all rules, regulations, or agreements which may prevent any worker on any war contract for munitions or supplies from working as many hours, or as many days, or as he or she is willing to work, or doing as much work as he or she wants to do to increase production so long as normal health safeguards are maintained. And we demand full and detailed public exposure of organizations and individuals responsible for obstructing production.

We declare war on all acts, or failures to act, by Members of the United States Senate or House of Representatives which permit or encourage representatives of either capital or labor to increase costs or obstruct production on war materials. And we demand full public exposure of any Member of Congress guilty of failure to protect our armed forces and our people against saboteurs of production in either group.

The signers of this declaration of war are not concerned with political partisanship. We are neither for nor against any employer or group nor any group of employees.

We are concerned with action—full, unbridled, speedy action. And we propose to devote ourselves to these tenets as a sacred trust. We promise that when men die needlessly the responsibility shall be firmly placed insofar as it is within our ability to place it.

To our Commander in Chief, the President of the United States—to the armed forces and the people—we pledge ourselves to this unalterable view for the duration of this war.

RESOLUTIONS OF COMANCHE COUNTY (KANS.) FARM BUREAU

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have just received a copy of resolutions adopted by the Comanche County (Kans.) Farm Bureau, at its twenty-fourth annual meeting at Coldwater, Kans. Inasmuch as these resolutions are written and approved directly by farmers themselves, they may be regarded as actual farmer sentiment. I believe the Senate may find them of interest for that reason.

These resolutions point out that—

First. Farmers will have to have prices allowing them to compete, comparably, with war industries if they are to obtain necessary help to produce needed foods.

Second. Farm boys should be encouraged to remain on the farm until drafted, and feel they are performing as patriotic service there as in what are called "essential war industries."

Third. Farmers need new farm machinery and, even more, they need repair parts, and need them now.

Fourth. Immediate steps should be taken to release materials for needed wire fence staples, nails for minor but necessary farm repair and maintenance jobs.

Fifth. The meat shortage is going to be much worse unless protein supplement for livestock feeding is made available. "The need for this feed is now, and not a month from now," say the Comanche County farmers.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD in full at this point, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the duly appointed resolutions committee, after having considered the general letter of G. M. GILLETTE, United States Senator from Iowa, and GEORGE D. AIKEN, United States Senator from Vermont, dated January 6, 1943, in which they discuss what they term several major questions that are still unanswered and that must be answered before farmers generally can obtain the maximum of production on their individual farms, state that the sentiment of this committee with reference to said questions is as follows:

1. It is the sentiment of this group that we express an appreciation to the President of the United States for his interest in farm mobilization and setting a date for same. We also express our appreciation to Senators GILLETTE and AIKEN for sending out their letter of inquiry concerning farm mobilization.

2. As to the labor problem, we feel that we as farmers must receive such prices for our marketed products as will enable us to compete with the wages offered in industry and other defense work. One way to accomplish this would be to raise the price ceilings on farm commodities. We feel that this will not materially tend to inflation as labor prices increased 113 percent from 1935 to 1939, while living costs for the same period increased less than half of this figure.

3. We think the farm-labor situation could be greatly helped if the boys now on the farm of the ages 17, 18, and 19 years could be convinced that they are rendering just as patriotic a service by remaining on the farm and supporting the men already in the service as they would be if they themselves were in the service. We feel that this frame of mind would be greatly cultivated if the farm boys had the assurance that they would not be drafted in some line of the service that does not appeal to them. Or to be more specific, if when they are given a deferred classification they would be assured that it would continue and we suggest that some form of formal recognition should be given to such boys.

4. We think that in the matter of farm machinery, we need some new machinery but the drastic need is an increased supply of repairs to be made available immediately. The amount of repairs made available should be at least 100 percent more than in former years. In this part of the country the demand for increased livestock production makes it absolutely necessary for us to have new machines, such as binders and field cutters, for harvesting our feed crops which must be produced and harvested with this equipment if we are to meet our livestock-the drastic need is an increased supply of equipment for this purpose is entirely inadequate.

5. We further state that immediate steps should be taken to release sufficient material for the production of wire-fence staples, nails, and other minor farm repairs needed every day on the farm and used only for necessary repairs. These products have never been and will not be hoarded if the farmers know they will receive sufficient quantities to keep their fences and other equipment in repair to meet their production goals. This lack of fencing materials and other repairs is definitely hampering our agriculture production and immediate steps must be taken to relieve the situation.

6. We also state that the lack of protein supplement for livestock feeding is our most urgent and immediate need. Unless protein feeds are released and placed in the hands of livestock feeders at once our production goals will not be met and our livestock will not be wintered with the usual gain in weight but will go on grass weighing less than normal. The need for this feed is now and not a month from now. These protein feeds must be obtained in the winter when grass and other green pastures are not available. With the big increase in the production of protein feeds in 1942 we feel that some steps can and should be taken to force the release of these feeds for livestock feeding where needed. At the present time it is impossible to purchase these feeds through the regular trade channels.

7. We endorse in full the Kansas State Farm Bureau resolutions as passed at its annual convention in Wichita, Kans., November 5, 6, and 7, 1942.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION OF LEGISLATURE OF OKLAHOMA—DISTRIBUTION OF GAS, FARM MACHINERY, TRUCKS, AND SO FORTH

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I present a memorial from the State Legislature of Oklahoma. I ask that the memorial be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The legislature resolution presented by the Senator from Oklahoma will be appropriately referred and, under the rule, printed in the RECORD.

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the United States is now at war with Germany, Japan, and Italy; and

Whereas the farmers of America produce in the main, the goods, food, and clothing—three of the outstanding fundamental essentials necessary to carry on and win the war; and

Whereas agriculture is of vital importance to the United Nations as a whole; and

Whereas the President of the United States has declared that the United States shall become an arsenal of democracy and the United States must furnish the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the nineteenth session of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma and the House of Representatives concurring therein, That we respectfully petition and memorialize the Congress and the President to enact a sane farm program containing the following pertinent provisions:

First. That the ceiling price of all farm products be set sufficiently high to enable farmers and producers to secure labor at a wage comparable to the wages now being paid common laborers employed in defense and industrial work.

Second. That Congress, the President, and the authorities in control of the manpower program take into consideration the necessity for farm labor and arrange, as far as possible, deferments for draftees called from the farms, to prevent a shortage of farm labor.

Third. That gas rationing and rationing of farm machinery and parts and repairs of farming machinery, including trucks, be furnished liberally to farmers and producers in order that the marketing of products and the other transportation items essential to the farming industry shall not be handicapped nor the production of farm products be curtailed.

Fourth. That the Congress and the President be memorialized and requested to call in representative dirt farmers from all parts of the country and consider with them in order that they may obtain a comprehensive and representative picture of the needs of agriculture; that a like and similar program be established for the livestock industry and for each branch of essential agriculture to the end; that a speedy and all-out victory be won for the United States and United Nations in 1943 or as soon thereafter as possible; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress from the State of Oklahoma.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

CONTINUATION OF AUTHORITY TO INVESTIGATE AIRPLANE ACCIDENTS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 60, submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] on January 14, 1943, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the authority conferred by Senate Resolution 307, Seventy-sixth Congress, agreed to October 9, 1940, and Senate Resolution 119, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to June 28, 1941 (providing for an investigation of airplane crashes), is hereby continued until the end of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any objection. I thought inquiries of the nature of that covered by the resolution were under the jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on Commerce. Does this resolution relate to a subcommittee or the full committee or a special committee?

Mr. LUCAS. The investigation is being made by a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of investigation was first referred to the Committee on Commerce, and was reported back by that committee.

Mr. McNARY. That explains the matter.

Mr. LUCAS. The resolution does not provide for any additional appropriation.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 60) was considered and agreed to.

CONTINUATION OF AUTHORITY TO MAKE INVESTIGATION WITH RESPECT TO FUEL IN CERTAIN AREAS WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably without amendment Senate Resolution 61, submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] on January 14, 1943, and ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the authority conferred by Senate Resolution 319, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to December 15, 1942 (providing for an investigation with respect to fuel in certain areas west of the Mississippi River), is hereby continued until the end of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

DENIAL TO CERTAIN MUSICIANS OF RIGHTS IN CONNECTION WITH MECHANICAL REPRODUCTION OF MUSIC

Mr. LUCAS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 81, submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK] on January 21, 1943, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the authority conferred by Senate Resolution 286, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to September 24, 1942 (authorizing an investigation of the action of the American Federation of Musicians in denying its members the right to play or contract for recordings or other forms of mechanical reproduction of music), is hereby continued until the end of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

CONTINUATION OF INVESTIGATION OF GASOLINE AND FUEL SHORTAGES

Mr. LUCAS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 28, submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] on January 7, 1943, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the authority conferred by Senate Resolution 156, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to August 28, 1941, Senate Resolution 189, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to December 9, 1941, and Senate Resolution 264, Seventy-seventh Congress, agreed to December 15, 1942, providing for an investigation with respect to shortages of gasoline, fuel oil, and other petroleum products and solid fuels, is hereby continued until the end of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

REPORTS ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, to which were referred for examination and recommendation 3 lists of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States that appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted reports thereon pursuant to law.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS—NOMINATION OF CLAUDE S. GILLETTE TO BE A REAR ADMIRAL

As in executive session,

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I report favorably several nominations for the Executive Calendar.

By Mr. GILLETTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs:

The following-named captains to be rear admirals in the Navy, for temporary service, to rank from the date stated opposite their names:

Howard F. Kingman, May 10, 1942.
Claude S. Gillette, May 13, 1942.
Sherman S. Kennedy, May 13, 1942.
Frank A. Braisted, August 7, 1942.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reports will be received as in executive session, and the nominations will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, through the thoughtful consideration and courtesy of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I have an opportunity to indicate my very personal interest in one of the nominations which has just been reported. I realize that the nominations would lie over under the rule, but it will be impossible for me to be present in the Senate at the next session, and as one of the names presented is that of my only brother, I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, to call the nomination up for consideration at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the request made by the able Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the clerk will state the nomination.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Claude S. Gillette to be rear admiral in the Navy.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, the Senate will understand the pleasure I have in moving that the Senate advise and consent to the advancement of Claude S. Gillette to the grade of rear admiral, United States Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and, without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs:

Sundry officers for appointment, by transfer and/or promotion in the Regular Army; and Sundry second lieutenants of the Army of the United States, who graduated from the United States Military Academy on January 19, 1943, for appointment in the Regular Army, under the provisions of law.

By Mr. CAPPER:

S. J. Res. 30. Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim the first day of each new year as Good Neighbor Day for the purpose of setting an example of neighborliness on the first day of the year, to serve as an inspiration and a standard for all the days to follow—leading to better relations at home, in all the Americas, and throughout the world; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ELVA BIRCH DAVIS

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I submit a resolution in behalf of the daughter of one of the employees of the Senate who passed away recently.

The resolution (S. Res. 89) was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Elva Birch Davis, daughter of Robert R. Birch, late an employee of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

E. E. MOECKEL

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 90), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to E. E. Moeckel, of Washington, D. C., the sum of $69.75 as compensation for stenographically reporting hearings held before Members of the Senate on October 9, 1942, relating to the use of rayon instead of cotton in the manufacture of automobile tires, and furnishing a transcript of such hearings.

UNITED NATIONS POST-WAR PEACE CHARTER

Mr. GILLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 91), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Senate approves the program of purposes and principles embodied in Joint Declaration of the President of the United States of America and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland dated August 14, 1941, and known as the Atlantic Charter.

That the Senate advises and urges the President of the United States to take early action to initiate, formulate, and make a joint treaty agreement with each and all of the United Nations subscribing to a joint declaration dated January 1, 1942, to wit:

The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, China, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, El Savador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Luxemburg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Poland, South Africa, Yugoslavia, and such other nations as have since that date or which may hereafter become associated with the United Nations in the struggle for victory over Hitlerism and similar governmental philosophies.

The Senate urges and advises that such formal treaty enunciate and stress that—

The joint signatories neither seek nor desire aggrandizements, territorial or otherwise,

That they respect and will approve the right of all people under proper opportunity to choose the form of government under which they will live and will countenance the restoration of sovereign rights and self-government to those who have been deprived of this choice,

That they will collaborate in the formulating of a just peace, embodying formulas for post-war collaboration to maintain peace and security throughout the world,

That they recognize the necessity for just and equitable collaboration by all signatories to secure for all nations an economic advancement, improved labor standards, social security, and access on fair and equal terms by all peoples to the raw materials and the international commercial channels of the world,

That the Senate suggests that such proposed treaty might be entitled "The United Nations Post-War Peace Charter."

ABILITY OF GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE TO EXERCISE APPROPRIATE SUPERVISION OVER GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. AIKEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 92), which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to make a full and complete study and investigation in order to determine whether the General Accounting Office, under its present organization, can properly carry out the functions, as an agency of the Congress, of maintaining constant supervision over expenditures in the executive agencies of the Government and of reporting, at least once each month and more often if required, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of the Senate and House of Representatives with respect to (a) whether funds appropriated to the various governmental departments and agencies are being properly and economically expended; (b) whether there are duplications of services and efforts by such departments and agencies and, if so, means for eliminating such duplication; (c) whether services of such departments and agencies can be reorganized so as to increase efficiency; (d) whether agencies interested with the recapture of large sums of money have properly functioned, and whether such sums due the Government have been recaptured; and (e) whether contracts entered into by the various agencies of the Government have been in compliance with existing law. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its study, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purpose of this investigation, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-eighth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

COST OF TAX COLLECTION AND DEFAULT IN INCOME TAXES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, there has been some unfortunate discussion across the country recently about the alleged high cost of tax collection through the United States Treasury. The subject was discussed in the Senate Finance Committee last week, and I asked Assistant Secretary Sullivan to furnish me with the facts for the RECORD. I am very happy now to present his letter which, far contrary to the reports which have been circulated, indicates that the cost of collection has been only 56 cents per hundred dollars, which is a thoroughly acceptable and commendable result.

Mr. Sullivan also presents, as bearing upon another phase of popular discussion at the present time, a table showing that the average default in the collection of Federal income taxes for the past 22 years has been only one and three-tenths percent.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter of Mr. Sullivan and the accompanying table be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 30, 1943.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the hearing before the Senate Finance Committee yesterday you asked me to secure for you the figures which would show the cost of collecting Federal taxes. For the fiscal year 1941 the cost of collection of all Federal taxes was 81 cents for each $100 collected. For the fiscal year 1942 this cost was 56 cents per $100 collected.

For your information I am enclosing a table showing the individual income-tax collections and defaults over a 22-year period from 1921 through 1942 I think the remarkably low percentage of defaults in the past is reassuring for the future.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

AWARDING OF E FLAG TO WAR PLANT AT SUNCOOK, N. H.

Mr. TOBEY Mr. President, on December 16, 1942, I was present and took a small part in the ceremony at Suncook, N. H., on the occasion of the awarding of the E flag of the United States Army and Navy to a typical war plant in this small New England town. This plant is one that has pioneered in producing airplane material for many years.

I should like to read into the RECORD the invocation given there by the Most Reverend John B. Peterson, D. D., Bishop of Manchester, which applies so well to the industrial workers all over our country whose one aim is to work unceasingly until victory is achieved.

The invocation is as follows:

May the Lord Christ, a workman and the Son of a workman, lend His smile of approval to what we do here today.

Our Nation honors the working men and women of these mills, and of this town called Suncook—honors them for their complete cooperation in its purpose to keep men free. Freedom O God, is Thy precious gift to men—a gift that can be and is used for Thy glory by those who in justice and charity live their love for their fellowmen; and for Thee.

The spindles and looms of these mills sing of that love as they spin and weave the pinions that bear freedom's defenders on their mission of love, loyalty, and liberty. That love and that loyalty spring from the hearts of the liberty lovers who toil in these mills. We honor them for their toil. We honor their mills and their town, the active scene of their labors. We honor their State and their Nation which are strengthened by their industry and their homes. We honor each one of them for what he or she has done and have given that freedom may still be ours and our children's. In honoring and thanking them, we of this Nation thank Thee, our loving God, author of liberty, whom by their toil and generous loyalty they honor. Through Christ our Lord. Amen.

CONTRIBUTION TO THE WAR EFFORT BY OCONTO COUNTY, WIS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have received a letter from Mr. Eldred Klauser, of Stiles, Wis., in which he points out that Oconto County has passed a resolution, which it has sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, advising him that it desires to invest its surplus in bonds of the United States Government in order to assist in the prosecution of the war.

The remarkable showing of this county in getting out of debt and the patriotic action of its county board, I think, are worthy of attention, and I therefore ask that Mr. Klauser's letter, copy of the resolution sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and a copy of the letter addressed to him, be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STILES FARMS,
Stiles, Wis., January 29, 1943.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the direction of the Oconto County Board of Supervisors I am enclosing copies of a resolution and letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury for your information and with a request for cooperation. Oconto County, after many lean years both because of the depression and because it is one of the "cut-over counties" of northern Wisconsin, is now on its feet financially, and is planning to set up reserves for post-war work programs to employ its own people on their return from the wars. Our county government, while appreciative, has been restless under the necessity of accepting aids from other branches of government in addition to those that are shared by all. The same meeting unanimously adopted a memorial thanking the State emergency board for the special aids it had given in the past, and saying we do not need them any more. While this is probably an entirely unorthodox attitude, we feel that you will sympathize and approve of it.

Yours very truly,

ELDRED KLAUSER,
Oconto County Planning Committee and County Auditor.

---

Whereas Oconto County, Wis., has received aid from the Federal Government in various programs for meeting its emergencies during the depression, and has used these where possible toward its permanent economic rehabilitation; and

Whereas Oconto County wishes, insofar as possible, to establish a reserve for public-works programs, anticipating the necessity of providing immediate emergency employment for its men on their return from the wars, and wishes to have the cash then available to pay for this, and not to help the war effort of the Federal Government which has, in past county emergencies so generously aided it; and

Whereas Oconto County has, through the cooperation of its taxpayers, been enabled to establish cash reserves and provisions in the current tax levy to retire all of its county tax debt, whether due or not, and to provide for the anticipated costs of county government on a reasonable basis for the present year, including a provision for a first installment for building up such reserves for post-war work programs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oconto County Board of Supervisors this 21st day of January 1943, That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be and hereby is petitioned to permit Oconto County to purchase United States Government securities for the purpose of its post-war emergency reserves, and that he be requested to designate the type of securities best suited from the standpoint of the United States Treasury to accomplish this purpose for the county and to aid the war effort; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this petition be mailed to our Senators and Congressman with the request for their cooperation in securing its purpose, and in so helping Oconto County prepare for providing insofar as is possible for the employment at its own expense of its own people on their return from the wars, and to have the cash then available for the purpose without the necessity of additional county tax levies when its own taxpayers will be passing through a period of post-war depression and adjustment.

---

OCONTO, WIS., January 26, 1943.

HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed is a certified copy of a resolution unanimously adopted by the Board of Supervisors of Oconto County, Wis., which I am directed to transmit to you. Having been very generously helped by the Federal Government in a time of great distress during the early years of the depression, and partly as a result of using this aid wherever possible to build a new stability and earning power for its people, it is now in a position not only to carry on its normal functions of county government without aids other than those granted to all counties in established Federal programs but to retire all of its county tax debt, and to build up reserves against the time of adjustment which will come after the war, when it wishes, as far as pssible, to care for the immediate employment of its own people on their return, at its own expense.

In building up its reserves and in providing for the future retirement of such debt, not yet due, and on which the creditors decline to accept prior payment, it would like to purchase United States Government bonds or other obligations which should help the war effort at this time but which it will wish to cash when the time is ripe to meet the emergencies for which the reserves are being established. We wish to know what securities to purchase out of the various types offered by the United States Government.

There are the following reserves for which we wish to make purchases between now and tax-settlement time in the month of March:

1. Highway equipment replacement reserve: The proceeds of all equipment transferred to the United States Government with which we wish to purchase war bonds of some type plus the amount of depreciation charges on highway machinery and equipment now in use. Between $18,000 and $20,000 on the basis of present sales to the Government, plus additional amounts later.

2. County highway construction reserve: An annual tax levy provision for future construction, the first $60,000 of which will be ready for investment on settlement of the current tax levy in March.

3. County tax debt retirement reserve: $38,100 now ready for investment, to retire bonds at $5,000 per year for each of 6 years, plus interest of about $5,000 payable in 1944 and smaller amounts each year thereafter.

If you are interested in a brief review of how Oconto County has, through planning and the cooperation of its taxpayers, changed from its status a few years ago as one of the essentially bankrupt "cut-over" counties of northern Wisconsin to its present status of being able to stand on its own feet, and without the allotment to it of any new defense industries or camps to bring it a temporary prosperity, a brief statement is enclosed herewith.

Yours very truly,

OCONTO COUNTY BOARD OF SUPERVISORS,
By ELDRED KLAUSER,
County Planning Committee and County Auditor.

CELEBRATION OF TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF THOMAS JEFFERSON

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I do not want to take the time of the Senate at any length. First I desire to thank the Senator from West Virginia for yielding to me so that I may present a matter which I deem most important. We are fighting a war all over the world. The policy has been announced both by the head of this Nation and also by our Allies. In my opinion, none of the pronouncements with reference to freedom that have been made of late is anything new. Many years ago a distinguished and great American announced those policies, and I believe that due tribute should be paid to his memory. I beg the indulgence of the Senate and of the Senator from West Virginia while I read a few thoughts which I have penned.

Thomas Jefferson has been immortalized in the mind and heart of all freedom-loving peoples. He is to us Americans our first and truest emancipator. The battles of today's global war are being fought for the four freedoms given to the world by Thomas Jefferson when he penned the American Declaration of Independence. His high performance as a public official exemplified those freedoms possibly more than has that of any other servant of the people. Certainly this record alone is enough to recommend the giving of appropriate homage to the memory of this giant among men on the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth, April 13.

In 1932, the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth was fittingly commemorated. It is only just and proper that Thomas Jefferson, Washington's fellow Virginian, and like him one of America's greatest gifts to the world, should receive due recognition as a man whose personal character and political stature have seldom, if ever, been equalled.

On April 13, the beautiful marble monument on the shores of the Tidal Basin is to be dedicated to the memory of Jefferson. But America and the world owe more to Jefferson than can be repaid in the form of a stone structure, imposing as it may be.

The Congress of the United States should, at the earliest opportunity, appropriate the necessary funds to effect the organization of committees, publicity units, and other agencies to honor Jefferson the man, and the Jeffersonian principles which we today so highly revere. In the process of paying homage to this outstanding American, we will relish the pleasure of refreshing our memories of Jefferson's exemplary life, and the youth of today and of tomorrow may be inspired to tread the paths of glory so effectively measured by his stride.

My plea is that Congress not delay the laying of all necessary plans to honor the memory of Thomas Jefferson, the author of our Declaration of Independence, the founder of the University of Virginia, the author of Virginia's statute for religious freedom—of an American whose activities and labors for the welfare of men call for the small payment of our eternal reverence.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief statement?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. A representative of the Government, the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Commission, has decided to dedicate the great memorial to Thomas Jefferson on the anniversary of his birthday this year. I thought that statement should be made at this time as a matter of information, because, of course, as a member of that Commission, I heartily endorse all that the Senator from New Mexico has said. There will be a great dedication on the 13th of April.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I thank the Senator.

THE FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION—EDITORIAL FROM BOWMAN COUNTY (N. DAK.) PIONEER

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial published in the Bowman County (N. Dak.) Pioneer of January 28, 1943. The editorial, which is in behalf of the Farm Security Administration, was written by a farmer, Mr. Otto Schade, who is a member of the Bowman County Railroad Committee, and is entitled "What Are We Fighting For?"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT ARE WE FIGHTING FOR?

(By Otto Schade, member of the Bowman County Railroad Committee)

The old slogan was, and still is, "We fight to maintain the principles of American democracy." Yes; that is worth fighting for, and our boys at the fronts are doing a great job of it right now. Even while thousands of our men are fighting and dying on the battlefields to uphold what we all like to think of as the American way of life, certain individuals representing certain interests in our country are today attempting to wreck the Farm Security Administration, which came into being as the answer to a drastic need for assistance to thousands of our farm families, who through the depression and drought found themselves literally stranded without the means or credit to reestablish themselves.

In 1936 we had nearly 1,700,000 farm families trying to live on an average income of less than $500 a year. To put it another way, more than 8,000,000 farm people tried to exist on about $2 per week. That is a long way from "the American way of life." That was the actual situation when the Farm Security Administration was organized.

Over a million farm families have now been given a fresh start with the help of the Farm Security Administration. The writer has been a member of the County Farm Security Administration Advisory Committee since the old Rural Rehabilitation Administration was first set up. I wish to ask those who are now trying to cripple the Farm Security Administration, a few definite questions:

1. Is it undemocratic for our Government to help low-income farm families to help themselves by extending loans at 5-percent interest, secured by a mortgage?

2. Is it undemocratic for our Government to back up these families with good sensible advice in order to increase food production?

3. Is it undemocratic for our Government to assist groups of farmers to purchase equipment on a cooperative basis, and to encourage and assist them in acquiring their own organization for selling, buying, and processing their own products?

4. Is it undemocratic for our Government to loan funds at 3-percent interest, secured by a real-estate mortgage, in order for tenants to purchase a farm of their own?

5. Is it undemocratic for our Government to assist nonvoting sharecroppers to become self-supporting American citizens?

The writer is quite certain that if our men who are right now doing the fighting for the rest of us had the opportunity to vote on these five questions, it would result in a practically unanimous "no" vote. Those who are willing to ruin the Farm Security Administration had better give some serious consideration to what plain Americanism stands for. It stands for a square deal for everyone. Yes; that includes even the unfortunate nonvoting sharecroppers.

I wish that the leaders of the wrecking crew could come out here and learn for themselves what the Farm Security Administration is really doing in assisting many families to gain complete rehabilitation. I am sure that such evidence would convince anyone of the true value of our work, which should not and cannot be judged on dollars alone, although even from that standpoint we can show a fine record. It should rather be judged from the standpoint of the dignity of people and their welfare. When seen in that light the Farm Security Administration represents what our boys are now fighting for, namely, the right of every man to work and earn a decent living and a square deal for everyone. That is the American way of life.

SCOTLAND GETS ITS OWN T. V. A.

[Mr. BONE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Scotland Gets Its Own T. V. A.," published in the Washington Daily News of Friday, December 18, 1942, which appears in the Appendix.]

INVESTIGATION OF STEEL PRODUCTION—REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAM (PT. 3 OF REPT. NO. 10)

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, from the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program I have the honor to submit a report known as the steel report. Our committee has been studying the steel situation for some time. We have gone into the subject exhaustively. We have heard witnesses here in Washington and in steel centers, and the report, which is rather lengthy and which will be submitted for the RECORD, is one which I believe every Senator should read.

I shall preface submission of the report by making a few observations of my own which will be very brief, and which will touch on only a few of the high points contained in the report itself.

Mr. President, steel, always the backbone of America's economy, is the keystone of our war production. But it has come very close to being the stumbling block. Almost all our strategic material shortages today could be relieved sooner if we had steel. The aviation gasoline program, the synthetic rubber program, the shipping program, the aircraft program, all have suffered for lack of steel. Our fuel oil and gasoline shortages, our farm machinery shortage, our railroad problems, our housing difficulties, could be relieved if sufficient steel were available.

On the other hand, we are producing steel in unprecedented amounts—86,000,000 tons in 1942 and over 90,000,000 tons expected in 1943. Our 1942 production came within 3,000,000 tons of equaling the total steel production of all the rest of the world—United Nations and Axis. The United Nations produced more than twice as much steel as their enemies produced.

The question which comes to mind is why there should be a famine amid such plenty. How does the Axis get along on so little? We now know that the Axis prepared for this war, built its plants, and stock-piled its armaments long before hostilities commenced. We, on the other hand, are hastening both to fashion the weapons and to build the plants at the same time. We must fill our present needs and those of our allies, and still attempt to build our stock piles of steel. That our needs are great is clear. The basic problems are whether we are making the best use of what we have, and whether we should create additional facilities to produce even more.

From its inception the committee has studied the steel picture continuously. Right at the start, early in 1941, we took the position that steel shortages would stall production lines. It was clear that immediate steps must be taken to increase steel facilities. The committee so advised the Office of Production Management, but steel expansion was delayed.

Three major factors are responsible for the steel shortage.

First, the armed forces seriously underestimated their needs. They are now using as much steel in 3 months as they previously stated they would need in a year. The sights were set too low. Throughout 1941 the Army and Navy Munitions Board freely granted necessary priorities for new armament plants, but refused clearance for steel mills to feed these plants.

The second contributing factor was the sluggishness of the Office of Production Management and the War Production Board in converting industry to a war-time basis. Far into 1942 untold tons of steel were poured into nonessential commodities. Not until the situation had become critical and the country's indignation had overflowed did the War Production Board eliminate those items, many of which may have been peacetime necessities, but all of which are unconscionable luxuries during an all-out war.

The third cause of the delay was the cupidity of the big steel companies. They were determined to keep control of the steel industry after the war. They feared the bugaboo of excess capacities when peace arrives. They dreaded the competition they might have to face should the smaller companies obtain some nourishment during the war program. The representatives and employees of Big Steel dominated the Iron and Steel Branch of the War Production Board. That was unfortunate. At first they failed to direct or even to allow expansion. Finally they concentrated a belated program in the eight largest companies. These Big Steel men and dollar-a-year men did just what they were accustomed to doing at home in normal times under normal conditions. To the eight largest steel companies they gave the lion's share of steel expansion. These eight companies produced approximately 80 percent of the steel ingots before the war. After the war they will still have the same control of the industry, but the small companies will not have kept even their meager dole of steel production. Before the war the small companies had approximately 20 percent of the ingot production. Unless the program is altered the larger companies will continue in the same strong position, while the weaker companies will have lost some of their pre-war standing.

Mr. President, the expansion program includes substantial tonnages for powerful newcomers in the industry, such as Kaiser and Koppers. The new companies' facilities will not affect the 80-percent control of Big Steel. Instead, it is the small companies which must move over to make room for the newcomers. Three companies alone—United States Steel, Bethlehem, and Republic—received a total of $696,128,000, or about 55 percent of the $1,283,667,000 which the Government is spending to expand the facilities of the entire steel industry. Apparently the Iron and Steel Branch of the War Production Board believed that only the big companies could make steel.

The Nation suffered for these shortcomings and for this selfishness. At the committee's hearings during August of 1942 we found an alarming shortage of steel ingot; that is, of unmilled steel produced by open-hearth and electric furnaces. This has not yet been relieved. As late as October 1942—the most recent month for which figures are available—the shipments of all types of steel amounted to less than one-half of the unfilled orders requested for shipment that month. If only those orders which were earmarked for the Army, the Navy, and the Maritime Commission had been filled, there would have been no steel left for any of the country's other needs, such as synthetic rubber, high-octane gas, oil pipe lines, lend-lease, or railroads. This situation still prevails.

We cannot expect to reap the benefits of the expansion program for another 6 to 12 months. Had this program been started earlier it would have been well on its way before other competing programs created a steel shortage. The committee knows of one instance where a steel company was unable to use its own steel to build a sorely needed blast furnace for itself, because it had more urgent orders on its books. It has been necessary to postpone all of the steel expansion program which cannot be finished before July 1943; otherwise we would not have enough steel for actual armaments. We do not have steel to support both programs. One or the other must give way. The battle will not wait.

The outlook for 1943, therefore, is not bright, it is gloomy. We will produce sufficient steel to satisfy our major war necessities, but there is no assurance that we will also be able to fill all the needs of essential civilian industries. These will have a 2-year backlog of needed repairs, replacements, and additions. We may well experience another serious shortage if the war continues for so long a time and its scope so expands as to require us to replace or increase plant facilities. Throughout 1943 continued shortages of the most important specialized types of steel must be expected. Electric furnace alloy steels, particularly those requiring special heat-treatment facilities, which are most important for the aircraft program, will continue to be scarce throughout 1943. Insufficient facilities for castings also will probably trouble us through all of this year.

There are not enough raw materials and manpower in this country to increase steel-making capacity until it is sufficient to provide for all possible needs. We must, instead, determine the amounts of the various forms of steel we shall need to win the war, and proceed to obtain that steel. We must expect to have less than we could profitably use; but we can make certain that the steel which we have is allocated and used efficiently and skillfully.

I am happy to report that much progress is now being made under the direction of Mr. H. G. Batcheller, who became Chief of the Iron and Steel Branch last September. The Branch was overhauled and advanced to the status of a division, called the Steel Division. Mr. Batcheller has proven capable and able, and has undertaken to meet the problems of the steel industry. He has made remarkable progress.

However, much still remains to be done. What has yet to be done, together with the limited facilities for doing it, represents, in my judgment, one of the most serious worries or problems of the war. A study of that problem, and of the advance which is being made by American genius, will be one of the greatest stories to come out of the war.

Specifications must be reexamined. Those which are too exacting should be eliminated. Sizes and grades should be standardized. New melting techniques should be adopted extensively, particularly in electric furnace operations where we face the prospect of serious shortages.

The steel companies must overcome their reluctance to disturb their settled customer relations. That factor is out for the duration. They must outgrow the technical conservatism which developed during the period when management did not have to extend itself to survive competition.

The present haphazard price structure must be given attention. Further attention must be given to the allocation of the products among consumers.

The committee has not seen any evidence that the scrap situation has been competently or completely taken in hand. Steel production may well suffer seriously unless increased supplies of high-grade scrap are made available. We believe that ultimate control over the collection of steel scrap should be placed in the Steel Division, and that it must be methodically and continuously worked out. The Steel Division should also be in a position to insist that the Office of Price Administration fix scrap prices high enough to induce the scrap dealer to go out and get the scrap. That is a very important recommendation. If we are to obtain scrap, the price must be reasonable. This does not mean an inflationary price increase. It means payment for increased labor and harder work.

In July 1942 the committee suggested that representatives of both labor and small mills should be given a place on the Steel Division's important committees. We believe that should be done without delay. The Little Steel men of the country should be brought into the picture. This has been done only recently and in a most limited way. The committee believes that considerably more can be done along these lines. When it has been done it will be possible for the Steel Division to break the stranglehold which big companies have on the entire industry. Then, and then only, the Steel Division will be able to beat down the industry's reluctance to meet wartime conditions. We shall then see the development of the steel industry along new lines and in new areas. In this way we shall get the steel we need to win this all-out war.

Mr. President, before I conclude I desire to ask my colleagues to read the report. I also ask them to study the progress which is being made in the shifting and expansion of the steel-production program.

I make the prediction that before this all-out war increases its compelling need upon our economy to the degree of greater hardships, American genius will respond to the challenge and make our supply of steel meet every wartime requirement, and almost all of the very vital civilian requirements.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MEAD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I move that Senate bill 607, which was introduced by the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and which is on the table, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, for hearings and consideration.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LUCAS in the chair). The Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD] has the floor.

Mr. PEPPER. Exactly.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I asked the Senator from New York to yield for a question, and he yielded to me. Therefore I have the floor.

I was watching for the conclusion of the Senator's remarks, as my beloved colleague the Senator from Florida was doing. He had the edge on me because he was standing to the rear of the distinguished Senator from New York, and he could more quickly tell when the remarks of the Senator from New York had been concluded than I could, and I had to beat him to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina for the purpose he has suggested?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has concluded his speech. I asked the Senator if he would yield and he said he would be glad to.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, if my distinguished colleague would only let me make reply to the Chair myself I should be obliged to him, and yet I might not be unfriendly to him.

It is true, Mr. President, that I had completed my speech; and it is also true that I thought I yielded for a question to come from my distinguished colleague the Senator from North Carolina, who now claims he has the floor. I thought I yielded to him to make some observations concerning my speech, or to have something inserted in the RECORD. However, if in yielding I should lose the floor, and there would be no opportunity for what I may modestly term "complimentary comment on the steel report," I might selfishly side against my distinguished colleague from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am standing on the record. The RECORD will show that I asked the Senator from New York to yield for a question. He answered me by saying that he would yield for one question.

Mr. MEAD. Apparently I yielded for that one question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Will the Senator yield to the junior Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MEAD. It appears to me that I must first yield to Senators who will have something to say concerning the steel report. After that I shall be glad to yield the floor so that my distinguished colleague from North Carolina may obtain recognition.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am in favor of steel, more steel, and better steel.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from North Carolina is apparently trying to steal the floor right now. [Laughter.]

I now yield to the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have not concluded. I have just begun my comments on the subject of steel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor. He has declined to yield for the purpose explained by the Senator from North Carolina, and he now yields to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to propound a few questions to the able Senator from New York, who has just submitted an outstanding report on behalf of the Truman committee, which has done so much to improve war production.

The first question is, Have the Senator and the committee which he ably represents found in their investigation of steel production and the provision of steel facilities that steel production for war purposes has been impaired or diminished in volume because of any division of responsibility among Government agencies in seeing that facilities are provided for the maximum production of steel?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, let me say in reply to my distinguished colleague that an early concentration of authority would have expedited the steel program, but, unfortunately, living in a democracy and planning only for peace, and without any experience in planning for an all-out war demanding over 100 percent of many of our important materials, there was a necessary evolution of authority and the creation of several different agencies involving delay which resulted in the slowing up of the steel program—a situation which could be corrected by a concentration of authority or by a concerted exercise of authority over this particular industry.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the able Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Do the able Senator and his committee find that the claimant agencies which have to do with steel production and the development of steel facilities are likely to be pulling in different directions, and likely to follow courses which tend to diverge, unless there is above all the claimant agencies some authority which can coordinate the Nation's effort to provide the maximum of steel-production facilities and the maximum steel output for the Nation?

Mr. MEAD. I think that is logical. In reply I should say that, as in the past, the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Maritime Commission always will seek to exert authority and precedent and priority over what might be termed "indirect war needs or vital civilian needs," and there always will be that vying for supremacy. Perhaps that will interfere with the farm program, the program for the production of high-octane gas, and the program for the production of synthetic rubber, for emphasis will be placed by the War Department upon purely war needs. Emphasis may be placed by the War Production Board upon needs for the production of supplies for the granary of the world, the agency having to do with the production of synthetic rubber might insist upon the necessity of developing the synthetic rubber program; and so there is need for an over-all directional head.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I should like to ask a further question, if the able Senator will further yield. Has it not been the discovery, therefore, of his distinguished committee that the matter of production for war purposes is essentially a single program, and that the facilities of the Nation must be mobilized as if the facilities in a single factory, if confusion, divided responsibility, and inefficiency are not to impair the whole war-production program?

Mr. MEAD. That is more true under present conditions in the all-out war than ever before was true in the history of the country.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I asked the Senator to yield in order, first, that I might compliment the committee for which he is speaking, of which the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] is the chairman, for the study which went into the preparation of its most excellent report.

It seems to me that one or two words might be added to what has been said in the report and in the comment of the Senator from New York. The Senator has very correctly pointed to the tremendous concentration which has been going on in the war industries. That matter is not covered in the report, for reasons which probably are obvious. I think I violate no injunction of secrecy, however, when I point out that, as of the 30th of June 1942, the United States Government had awarded war contracts in the value of $55,400,000,000. Of that tremendous sum, which is actually beyond the capacity of the human mind to imagine, more than 70 percent was awarded to 100 companies. Worse than that, in excess of 50 percent of that $55,400,000,000 worth of contracts was awarded to 24 companies. In other words, 24 large corporations in the United States, headed by the General Motors Corporation, which alone received $4,500,000,000 worth of those contracts, have been awarded in excess of $27,000,000,000 worth of contracts. Not only is that true, but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, operating through the Defense Plant Corporation, one of its subsidiaries, has expended in excess of $8,000,000,000 for construction of war facilities of various kinds; and many of the 24 companies which have received more than half of all the war contracts have also been beneficiaries under the facilities expansion program.

Mr. President, the statement of that rather startling fact is not meant to be a criticism of the War Production Board or of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It should not be so interpreted. It is merely a statement of a condition which is going to be the source of the most significant and important problem which the people of the United States will have to settle after this war. As the Senator has very well pointed out in the report, the production of steel in the United States has been increased from approximately 38,000,000 ingot tons in 1937 to 89,000,000 tons in 1942. However, even that great expansion is not sufficient to permit us to provide the steel needed for the war effort alone.

Let us take the case of shipping: The Maritime Commission last year produced 8,000,000 tons of shipping. Its goal this year is 16,000,000 tons, at least. It has the capacity of producing 20,000,000 tons of shipping. We need the 20,000,000 tons, because the German war effort this year is being directed in a submarine campaign for the destruction of every possible ship which the United Nations have and which the submarine campaign can reach. The submarine campaign for the destruction of American shipping is the last recourse of Hitler in his war effort. He has been hemmed around everywhere else, and his object now is to prevent the United States from getting the men and the supplies to the war front in Europe. Obviously, therefore, it is of tremendous importance that we should have increased capacity and increased production of steel if we are to manufacture the needed ships.

That is not enough. The Navy Department seeks to expand the construction of escort vessels in order to protect the convoys used in sending both men and supplies abroad. The construction of additional escort vessels requires more steel than it is possible for the War Production Board to allocate among the various agencies.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interject?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. MEAD. In view of the fact that I have a luncheon engagement, and also an embarrassing predicament facing me here, I wonder if I may steal away, and leave the floor with the distinguished Senator?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I did not mean to take the distinguished Senator from Wyoming off his feet. He was making a very able statement, and I trust that he will be permitted to continue. As I said, I have an engagement, and I should like to keep it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield the floor?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I should like to ask the Senator whether his committee has in mind certain legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield in order that the Senator from Minnesota may direct a question to the Senator from New York.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask the Senator whether the committee which has submitted the report has in mind legislation to cure the situation?

Mr. MEAD. No. We have contained in our report, which will be printed in the RECORD, recommendations to alleviate existing conditions—recommendations which we trust will be acceptable to the War Production Board, particularly to the Steel Division and to the other services which require a portion of the steel which we have available and which we will have available. We do not recommend legislation, but we recommend a method of procedure.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I was about to conclude. I desire to call attention to the fact that not only does the Maritime Commission need steel, not only does the Navy Department need steel, but the Office of Petroleum Coordinator needs steel for the plants necessary for the manufacture of the high-octane aviation gasoline which is essential in order to carry on the war in the air. The director of the synthetic-rubber production program needs steel in order to manufacture synthetic rubber. The railroads need steel in order to build tank cars, more freight cars, and more locomotives to transport men and materials.

In other words, Mr. President, wherever we look in the war effort we find a crying necessity for more and more steel, and the worst factor of all lies in the fact that in the United States there is not sufficient scrap to enable us to continue to produce the amount of steel which we are now turning out. It is of the greatest possible importance that there should be increased collections of scrap and increased production of substitutes for scrap.

A small effort has been made in that direction. The Committee on Appropriations during the last year and a half, realizing this problem, has made appropriations for the purpose of meeting it; but always there has been some vague and indefinite opposition to the development of any program that would produce steel by anything but the blast furnace method.

In the State of Nevada at Boulder City, through the appropriation made by Congress, a plant now being operated by the Bureau of Mines is turning out from 8 to 10 tons of iron daily. A plant is being constructed at the University of Wyoming by the Bureau of Mines to test certain processes there. These efforts, however, are only scratching the surface. What is needed is an all-out program to produce iron by any and every method if we are to provide the materials needed for the war.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I know the great difficulty the able Senator from Wyoming has had, and I know the long struggle in which he has participated and which he has led toward providing additional steel facilities and raw materials for the country. I wish to ask the able Senator whether he has found that the division of authority and responsibility for doing what he last said, that is making the fullest use of the Nation's resources with respect to steel production, has, in his opinion, impaired or in any way impeded his efforts.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Committee on Public Lands, which submitted a report or several reports during the past year and a half upon this general subject, recently, 2 or 3 months ago, submitted its report on petroleum, and there it pointed out, as this committee has also pointed out, the division of authority among five or six agencies. The same division of authority exists with respect to the production of other mineral resources. For example, the War Production Board has its agents working throughout the country; it has special representatives dealing with the production of minerals; the R. F. C. has a special corps of employees working on the production of minerals; the Bureau of Mines has officials working on the same subject as has the United States Geological Survey. I will state to the Senator that the subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am chairman, has contemplated using the same technique with respect to minerals that it has used with respect to oil, namely, to invite the heads or the representatives of each of the separate agencies to a round-table discussion, so that, across the board, they may, in public, discuss this conflict of authority which ought to be eliminated.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the able Senator yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. PEPPER. As a matter of fact, was it not necessary for the able Senator, acting legislatively as chairman of the committee, with his committee, to get the various representatives of the departments having jurisdiction over this subject before the committee so as to obtain any coordination of their activities and efforts whatever?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is exactly correct.

Mr. PEPPER. In other words, the Congress, aside from the person of the President, was the only agency in Washington which could get a coordination of the activities of the Government dealing with a single subject.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think it ought to be added there that the Congress, throughout the entire period of preparation for the war and during the war itself, has been constantly urging a greater degree of coordination among the executive branches of the Government; and the Congress, contrary to the representations which have been so persistently made, has never failed to urge greater and greater progress and efficiency in the organization of the war.

Now, Mr. President, let me add one word further, and I shall yield the floor. I desire to refer to the tremendous importance of the concentration which has gone on. It may have been altogether necessary, that this concentration should be made effective, if we were to get the results which have already been achieved; and in any criticism that is voiced of conditions which exist here, there ought to be an acknowledgment of the fact that a perfectly tremendous program of accomplishment is to the credit of all these agencies, even though they have been divided and even though there has been concentration represented by the fact that more than 70 percent of the total amount of contracts was awarded to 100 companies. What we must look forward to is this: When the war is ended and when the Government contracts are no longer flowing to these corporations and to others, when the workers who are now engaged in the war industries are being demobilized, there will arise the greatest economic and political question which has ever been presented to America, namely, how are we to provide opportunities for employment to those who have been gathered into these great enterprises for the production of war goods?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the subject of the great concentration which has taken place I believe we ought right here to go back in our thinking and in our history and remember that it was the problem of concentration which, in a small way, made so difficult the setting up of stock piles looking toward such a time as we have today. It is the habit of thinking on the part of people and certain governmental and industrial and labor notions about things that stand in the way at all times.

If, for example, there should be greater concentration on a larger scale, without a change of outlook, without a change of habit, the problems are going to be more difficult than they ever were.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me interrupt the Senator. I am happy he has raised this phase of the problem, because it gives me the opportunity to make the record clear, that it was the Senator from Utah who, as long ago as 1938, I believe——

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. 1935.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator corrects me and says 1935—as long ago as 1935 he introduced legislation in this body for the purpose of enabling the accumulation of the necessary stock piles. The Senator from Utah was aware of what was going on in Europe, and he initiated the legislation and brought the legislation upon the floor calling for the accumulation of stock piles and the granting of all necessary authority for that purpose; but, nevertheless, it was not done or, at least, it was not done in sufficient degree to avert the shortage crisis in which we have found ourselves for the past year or more.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I thank the Senator from Wyoming. I wish to make a simple point that everyone can understand. The principal problem in setting up stock piles was the problem of price. Everyone could see that if great demand came there would be need for stock piles, but the large industrialists like to buy in a cheap market. The setting up of stock piles acts as the building up of reserves, making the commodity a little scarcer. So there was a fear on the part of many in business that if the Government, looking to the future, set up stock piles it might do one of two things: It might release the stock piles at an untimely moment and thereby deflate prices or put them down or it might, on the other hand, build up such immense stock piles that the price would rise to such an extent that ordinary industry could not buy that which it needed.

Mr. President, when we realize the habits of thought of our people we come to the conclusion that the trouble with our country was that the people of the United States had a fear of their Government. The irony of ironies has taken place. In a country such as ours, controlled by the people, where the Government is responsible to the people, where, in theory and practice, the Government must react to the people, the people themselves become frightened of the Government when it tries to do something to help them.

That is the basic irony of attempting to change anything, it does not matter what. If we move into the health field, it is the doctors who are frightened. If we move into the hospital field, it is the hospitals which are frightened. If we move into the insurance field, it is the insurance companies which are frightened. When the people of our country learn that the Government of the United States is on their side, taking steps which are designed to build up, then will come the right kind of prosperity and the right kind of cooperation between the Government and the people.

There is a natural tendency for a person who has a business to desire to make a monopoly of his business, to want to expand his business and to have no one come into the competitive field. Yet, in the history of competition, it has been competition itself which has caused the great expansion of the original producers of things. It has changed the habits of people, created greater demand and greater activity.

Now, we have before us such bills, for example, as the bill for the rehabilitation of returned soldiers, and persons who have been injured. Some have argued that bill and will argue the bill on the basis of State's rights, for example, whether the Government should execute the law or the States should do it.

Mr. President, why can we not think about the individual? If we can return to society a presently worthless individual, and make him an economic asset, does not that individual help industry? Does he not help his State? Does he not help his Government?

Why should there ever be these theoretical conflicts between Government and industry, between the States and the Nation, when we are trying to do something for the good of men, women, and children in the United States? Can we not see that if we separate the men, women, and children from the United States, we do not have the United States, and can we not see that wherever we create wealth, we bring about a stimulus for the creation of more wealth?

For these reasons I cannot help saying, since this remarkable discussion has started, that what we have to do is to understand the psychological aspects of these questions, the habit-forming aspects of the questions, and, above all, have the thing we call faith, and realize that, after all, 130,000,000 people are destined to a certain kind of leadership in the world, as the result of the last 150 years of their history, and to understand that we cannot ever see our Government and our people take the place in the world which they must take without realizing the destiny that is forcing them on, and without realizing the position they have among the peoples of the earth.

The report submitted by Mr. MEAD from the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program was ordered to be printed (pt. 3 of Rept. No. 10) and entire is as follows:

DRAFT OF STEEL REPORT—SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

Steel, always the backbone of America's economy, is the keystone of our war production. But it has come very close to being the stumbling block. Almost all of our strategic-material shortages today could be relieved sooner if we had steel. The aviation-gasoline program, the synthetic-rubber program, the shipping program, the aircraft program, all have suffered for lack of steel. We have been short of both gross tonnage and the specialized types of steel. Our fuel oil and gasoline shortages, our farm-machinery shortage, our railroad problems, our housing difficulties could be relieved if sufficient steel were available

On the other hand, we are producing steel in unprecedented amounts—86,000,000 tons in 1942 and over 90,000,000 tons expected in 1943. Our 1942 production came within 3,000,000 tons of equaling the total steel production of all the rest of the world—United Nations and Axis. The United Nations produced more than twice as much steel as their enemies.

The question which comes to mind is why there should be a famine amid such plenty. How does the Axis get along on so little? We now know that the Axis prepared for this war, built its plants, and stock piled its armaments long before hostilities commenced. We, on the other hand, are hastening both to make the armaments and to build the plants at the same time. We must fill our present needs and those of our allies, and still attempt to build our stock piles. That our needs are great is clear. The basic problems are whether we are making the best use of what we have and whether we should create additional facilities to produce even more.

The committee has studied the steel picture continuously since the committee's inception. During the spring of 1941, shortly after beginning its study of steel production, the committee took the position that shortage of steel, as well as almost all of our basic raw materials, would stall production lines. It was clear that immediate steps must be taken to increase production. In each case the committee so advised the Office of Production Management

Three major factors delayed steel expansion and are responsible for our current steel shortage.

First, the armed forces seriously underestimated the amount of steel they would need under war conditions. As late as November 1941 the armed forces estimated their steel requirements at a total figure much smaller than their present demands. They are now using as much steel in 3 months as they previously informed the Office of Production Management they would need in a year. The much discussed Gano Dunn report concluded in February 1941 that the then existing capacity would be sufficient for both military and civilian needs on the basis of these low estimates of military needs. The sights were indeed set too low, and this should have been evident to reasonable men. Throughout 1941 the Army and Navy Munitions Board freely granted necessary priorities for new end product plants but refused clearance for raw materials facilities to feed these plants.

The second cause of the delay was the desire of the big steel companies to prevent any expansion that might react unfavorably against their control of the steel industry after the war. They feared both the possibility of having excess capacities of steel-making facilities after the war, and the competition of smaller companies which might gain strength during the war program. The representatives and employees of big steel companies dominated the Iron and Steel Branch of the War Production Board. They first failed to direct or even to allow expansion. Finally they concentrated practically all of the belated expansion in the hands of the eight largest companies. The Office of Production Management, which was the predecessor of the War Production Board, failed to make proper estimates of steel requirements even after its delinquencies were called to its attention by the committee.

The third contributing factor to the present condition was the delay of the War Production Board in converting industry to a war basis. Untold tons of steel were permitted to be consumed until far into 1942. The priorities system was designed to assure at least that war industries would be supplied before any others. It failed to accomplish its purpose and did not stem the huge flow of steel into nonessential commodities.

The committee held hearings during August 1942. It continued thereafter to follow developments intensively and to discuss the steel program privately with the War Production Board. At the committee's hearings it found an alarming shortage of ingot, that is, of unmilled steel produced by open hearth and electric furnaces This has not yet been relieved. In October 1942 (the most recent month for which figures are available) the shipments of all types of steel were less than half of unfilled orders covered by preference ratings requested for shipment in that month. The total orders on the books of the steel producers which carried certification that the material was for the Army, Navy, and Maritime Commission amounted to more steel than the entire country could produce in that month. Certainly it was more than could be consumed with existing fabrication facilities. If these orders had been filled there would have been no steel for defense projects (other than on direct Army and Navy orders), for lend-lease, railroads, or for any of the other civilian needs essential to our war production.

The full benefits of the present expansion program cannot be felt for another 6 to 12 months. Had this program been started on a larger scale at the outset of the defense emergency, it would have been well under way before other competing programs rendered it impossible to fill all urgent needs. The committee is informed of one instance where a steel company, making large quantities of the types of steel needed for an additional blast furnace it was constructing, was unable to obtain permission to use its own steel for the purpose because it had more urgent orders on its books. During the spring of 1942, it was found necessary to postpone those parts of the plant expansion program which could not be finished before July 1943. Otherwise we would not have enough steel for actual armaments. We do not have steel to support both programs. The battle will not wait.

Today it appears that we will barely produce sufficient steel in 1943 and thereafter to satisfy the major war necessities. The expansion program will be slightly delayed by the recent decision to advance the synthetic rubber, aviation gasoline, and aluminum plants. After July 1943 the most urgent demands for steel to be used in constructing new plants will have been filled as a result of the policy of finishing major plant construction by that date. Thereafter primary needs for steel will be for actual armaments, for fighting equipment, for the shipbuilding program, and for essential civilian equipment such as railroads and farm machinery. There is every reason to believe that there will be substantial amounts of steel for military purposes. But there is no assurance that we will be able to fill all the needs of essential civilian industries which will have a 2-year backlog of needed repairs, replacements, and additions. We may well experience another shortage if the war so continues, and its scope so expands as to require us to increase or replace plant facilities. The present prospects for over-all ingot tonnage may therefore be viewed without undue alarm, although not with complacency.

The outlook for specialized types of steel, on the other hand, is not as promising. A sufficient gross tonnage of ingot does not in any way assure that specific alloy steels and hardened steels, needed for the various programs and for the aircraft program in particular, will be available. Until the latter part of 1943 there will continue to be a shortage of castings and of electric furnace alloy steels, particularly those requiring special heat-treating facilities and other special facilities.

The shortages of raw materials and manpower in this country are such that we cannot expect to end the steel problem by simply increasing steel-making capacity until it is sufficient to provide for all possible uses. We must, instead, determine the amount of the various kinds of steel which we will need to win the war and then proceed to increase steel-making capacity to that amount. Consequently throughout the war we must expect to have less steel that we could profitably use and we must make sure that the steel which we have is allocated and used efficiently and skillfully.

Allocation of steel to consumers has been one of the vitally important jobs of this war. It is complicated by the need to plan facilities far in advance for the types of products which will be needed. Unless the various products balance, excesses in any line are simply wasted; not only is capacity lost but also the large quantities of steel and labor used in building the plants. In this way the task of allocation is very closely related to the task of planning production capacity. As a result of misdirected planning and shifts in emphasis by the armed forces, we are now facing overcapacities of facilities to produce armor plate, and deficits of alloy steels and of heat-treating and casting facilities. Throughout the second half of 1942 plate capacity far exceeded demand. Construction of some plate mills was canceled. But under the shipbuilding program for 1943 we again face a deficit.

Poor allocation of the product on hand was one of the most serious failures of the iron and steel branch during most of 1942. This committee ascertained during its hearings that the branch did not know the ultimate use to which a substantial part of steel deliveries was put. In the summer of 1942 it became apparent that the priority system was entirely inadequate for the task at hand Beginning in August 1942 an effort was made to install a system of allocations to replace the priority arrangements. The outgrowth of this is the controlled-materials plan, which corrects many of the weaknesses of the priority system. If the armed forces make their needs known sufficiently early and the administrative details are carefully handled, it should solve the problem. The system of controlling production by issuing production directives on rolled steel products to the various steel mills has also helped eliminate previously existing inefficiencies, although the priorities system is still impeding efforts to control the production of steel.

On September 21, 1942, Mr. H. G. Batcheller became head of the Iron and Steel Branch of the War Production Board. He has proven capable and able and has undertaken to meet the problems of the steel industry.

Under Mr. Batcheller's direction, the management of the steel situation has progressed considerably and should progress further in the future. The former Iron and Steel Branch of the War Production Board was advanced to the status of a division, called the Steel Division, centralizing jurisdiction over its activities in fewer hands. An effort was made to revamp the expansion program to the fullest extent possible at this late date.

At the time of the committee's hearings, the then Iron and Steel Branch depended almost wholly on trade associations for industry statistics. However, the present Steel Division's approach to the problem is to get as close to the industry as possible, and one of its new functions in this direction is the collection and analysis of its own statistics.

While much has been accomplished in the last few months, there still remains much to be done. It is too late to talk of readjusting the basic steel program. However, it is not too late to attempt to utilize what we have in order to get the most out of it and to provide much-needed special facilities.

Specifications must be reexamined with a view to elimination of too exacting requirements. Sizes and grades should also be standardized. The new national emergency alloys should be used much more extensively. These have the strength, and by utilizing most modern technique, save critical alloying metals. Centrifugal and pressure castings should be substituted for many types of forgings, with resultant savings of steel, time, labor, and facilities. Modern melting practices already developed to a high degree should be adopted extensively, particularly in electric-furnace operations. Much more open hearth alloy steel should be made. Mills should be required to limit their output to those items for which they are best suited, each mill specializing in some items. They should also discontinue making a range of items requiring loss of tonnage due to change-overs. The alloy steel field and the ferro-alloy field must be carefully studied, with a view to increasing emphasis on products now underproduced. The Steel Division is now working on most of these matters.

Many of the above problems arose because of the reluctance of the steel companies to disturb their settled customer relationships. Some result from the technical conservatism which has grown in big companies which have not had to perform miracles of production to survive in competition. Many result from a haphazard price structure. It is natural for steel consumers to purchase the cheapest articles that will meet their requirements. In too many instances the lowest prices prevail on the steels that are least desirable to the over-all steel program. The national emergency steels, for instance, have been developed to serve as adequate substitutes for steels rich in alloying elements. But the new steels are now more expensive. As a result steel consumers purchase and use, and have been allowed to purchase and use, the standard steels instead of the satisfactory new alloy saving steels.

The scrap-steel picture must be given careful attention, and the utilization of alloy steel turnings in particular is the most pressing problem. Production with present facilities can be expected to fall short of capacity, unless supplies of high-grade scrap are made available. The committee has not seen any evidence that the scrap situation has been competently taken in hand; certainly it has not been solved. Ultimate control over the collection of scrap steel should be placed in the Steel Division, with the power in that Division to issue directive to the Salvage Division, which is the organization within the War Production Board charged generally with the task of collecting scrap. The Steel Division should also be in a position to insist that the Office of Price Administration fix scrap prices high enough to induce the scrap dealer to go out and get it. This does not mean an inflationary price increase. It means paying for the increased labor of looking farther afield and working harder to collect the scrap.

Personnel changes in the Steel Division have improved the working force. However, the committee's suggestion made in July 1942 that representatives of both labor and small mills should be given a place on the Division's important committees has been followed only very recently and in a most limited way. The committee believes that considerably more can be done along these lines.

The big companies retain their stranglehold on the entire industry, and are still reluctant to adopt new melting practices or to adapt themselves to varying conditions of scrap and ore supply. This retards efforts to develop the industry along new lines and in new areas. The expansion program was arranged by War Production Board committees composed mainly of men associated with the big companies and loaned to the Iron and Steel Branch on a dollar-a-year basis. The program which was sponsored by these representatives of the Big Steel interest gave the lion's share of the expansion to the big steel companies at the expense of the small steel companies. The eight largest steel companies each have an ingot production of approximately 3,000,000 tons or more each. These are United States Steel Corporation, Bethlehem Steel Co., Republic Steel Corporation, Inland Steel Co., Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, American Rolling Mill Co., Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., and National Steel Corporation. Prior to the war these companies produced approximately 80 percent of the steel ingots. They were unable to prevent new companies such as Kaiser and Koppers from obtaining a substantial portion of the increase in steel-making capacity, but they were able to see to it that those increases were made at the expense of the smaller producers of steel while Big Steel retained its 80-percent proportions of the industry. Three companies alone, United States Steel, Republic, and Bethlehem received a total of $662,888,000, or 53 percent of the $1,250,872,000 which the Government spent to expand the facilities of the entire steel industry.

Full discussion of the above is divided into three categories:

1. The steel expansion program.
2. Inefficiencies in utilizing existing capacity, including use of scrap, use of manpower, and scheduling of production.
3. Distribution of steel products.

THE STEEL EXPANSION PROGRAM

In 1938 total steel ingot production was approximately 38,000,000 net tons, and total capacity was 73,047,892 net tons. In 1942 production was 86,092,209 net tons, and capacity on November 1 was 89,454,000 net tons. At the end of 1943 capacity will be 97,115,000 net tons. Practically all of the new production facilities are scheduled for completion by the middle of 1943.

Before there can be full understanding of the task confronting this country in the expansion of steel-producing facilities at the outset of the defense program, it is necessary to consider the status of the steel industry at that time. We did not start with a normally healthy industry. It was instead engaged in a struggle for survival. In June 1938 pig-iron production was at its lowest point with a production of approximately 1,200,000 tons for the month. Similarly ingot production reached its lowest point in December 1937 with a production of approximately 1,700,000 tons for the month. When the objective of 5,900,000 tons of pig iron per month and 8,250,000 tons of ingot per month in December 1943 is considered, the full extent of our rapidly expanding program can be realized.

Because our steel production during the years 1937, 1938, and 1939 was much less than our capacity to produce steel we failed to produce 50,000,000 tons of steel which we could have made. This should be contrasted with the policy in the Axis Nations of producing steel at full capacity in preparation for war.

It was a difficult task even to bring production close to capacity. Plants had been abandoned, dismantled, and scrapped. Some of the weaker, nonintegrated companies had given up the struggle, their departure hastened by stronger companies. The big companies seized the opportunity to acquire their floundering competitors and accelerate the program of dismantling and scrapping as a method of eliminating competition.

Judged by these standards production has been tremendously expanded. But much more might have been done. The late start and the insistence on conventional methods have limited us mainly to conservative increases primarily raising the capacities of the larger companies. There is ample evidence that the west coast and the South could provide the raw materials for considerable expansion to supply demands in those areas. Some expansion there has been authorized. Considerably more could have been permitted had the program been started early enough when the steel necessary for construction was available. The expansion program hewed to the lines laid out by the big companies. As a result, it relied on the huge tonnages the few companies could produce and paid only slight attention to the possibility that in wartime the aggregate contribution of many small producers could be substantial. Practically no weight was given to the possible contributions of newcomers or of new processes.

Before the expansion program went into effect 8 companies producing more than 3,000,000 tons of ingots each, had a total of 79.8 percent of the pig iron capacity, 79.3 percent of the steel ingot capacity, and 68 percent of the finishing capacity of the country.

After the program the eight big companies will have substantially maintained their position in the industry as a result of obtaining a share of the expansion in capacity roughly proportionate to their domination of the original industry.

But although the big companies were able to extend their domination even in the Government program the small companies did not fare as well. Powerful newcomers in the business (Kaiser, Lone Star, Koppers) were awarded 11.5 percent of the total pig iron expansion and 8.1 percent of the ingot. The smaller companies therefore will emerge with a smaller proportion of the total production than they had before the war.

Moreover, the big companies prepared their expansion projects in such a way as to balance their facilities, that is, to use in their fabricating mills all of the steel ingot they produced. As a result the small companies which do not have steel-making equipment are having great difficulty in obtaining sufficient ingot to continue their operation. The Steel Division is now attempting to remedy this situation by allocation of ingot. Not a single instance can be found where a small company with only finishing facilities received steel-making facilities under the program despite the fact that applications for such facilities were made.

It appears that the dollar-a-year men from the big steel companies who directed this expansion had a conviction that only the big companies could make steel. Unfortunately, the War Production Board committees selected to pass on the expansion program were dominated by officials of the five largest steel companies and did not even have a representative of the small companies or of labor to voice any opposition. The public could hardly be expected to rely on the wisdom or impartiality of the committees so constituted. Nor could it be favorably impressed by the delays in the expansion program and the favoring of Big Steel.

The expansion program calls for a total ingot capacity of 97,115,000 net tons at the end of 1943. Since over 7,000,000 tons will be in construction during 1943, total production in 1943 will be only 94,666,000 if production comes up to capacity. However, past experience indicates that ingot production is not likely to equal capacity. In 1941, despite a potential capacity of 84,152,292 net tons existing on January 1, 1941, the actual production of steel for the entire year was 82,836,946, or approximately 97 percent of capacity. Similarly, in 1942, production of 86,092,209 tons was attained with a potential capacity on January 1, 1942, of 87,862,000 net tons and a capacity on November 1, 1942, of 89,454,000 net tons.

Moreover, looking further into the figures behind the proposed capacity, other factors appear which cast further doubts on the likelihood that production will measure up to the forecasts.

The expansion program contemplates that to support a production of 97,115,000 net tons of steel ingots, the following materials will be necessary: Pig iron, 61,759,000 tons; home scrap, 27,192,000; purchased scrap, 14,386,000; ore to be fed directly into open hearths, 8,911,000; fluxes, 8,137,000 tons. It is not clear that all of these materials will be available.

On January 1, 1942, the existing blast-furnace capacity for the production of pig iron was 60,010,000. This, however, was not all available for the manufacture of steel, as 9,500,000 tons were used in the manufacture of ferroalloys, gray-iron castings, and other iron products, leaving 50,510,000 tons available for steel-ingot production. The expansion program is designed to increase blast-furnace capacity by 10,840,000 tons, resulting in a final capacity at the completion of the program of 70,850,000 tons. However, 9,500,000 tons will still be required for iron production and miscellaneous uses, leaving only 61,350,000 for steel making, as against the pig-iron requirements of 61,759,000 tons needed to support the contemplated ingot program.

Home scrap is the term used to describe scrap produced within the finishing departments of a steel plant and returned to its steel-making units. The program expected to produce 94,666,000 tons of ingots is based on a production of home scrap equal to 28 percent of ingots produced. The committee has been advised that, based on past operations, home scrap approximated 20 to 25 percent of the total ingot production. This would mean that 3 to 8 percent less of ingots produced would be utilized in final steel products so that the gain in ingot production would be offset by the loss in final products. On the 20- to 25-percent basis, the reoccurring scrap would approximate somewhere between 19,000,000 and 24,000,000 tons, if we assume a 94,666,000-ton production. The 28-percent figure which would yield the desired 27,192,000 tons is based on the expectancy that quality steels will be used in greater quantities in the future. These steels yield a larger amount of scrap than the common grades of steel. On the other hand, in peacetime operation the major portion of a steel plant's ingot production followed through the plant to the finishing departments. Today, much less ingot is finished in American plants due to the abnormal demand for ingots and for semifinished products to supply lend-lease requirements. As a result the supply of scrap can be expected to decrease.

The estimated 14,386,000 net tons of purchased scrap which is required for the program may or may not be realized. The persons charged with scrap collections are not in a position to advise the Steel Division whether it will be forthcoming. This situation is discussed more fully below.

It is doubtful whether the 8,911,000 tons of lump ores called for in the program will be available. High-density ores are required for feeding directly into open-hearth furnaces, a practice becoming more and more important because of the scrap shortage. There is a deficiency of lump ores of sufficient density for this operation so that it is necessary to treat the available ores to increase their density. This is called sintering. But it is questionable whether there is an adequate supply of the proper kind of sinter to make up for the deficiency of satisfactory ore. The melters who actually make the steel have stated that there is not enough sinter, but the Industry Advisory Committee and the Steel Division have not made a thorough study of the problem. One proposed step has been approved by the Steel Division, to assure an emergency supply of high-grade ore which could be fed directly to open hearths. This is a plan to drain Steep Rock Lake, now covering easily accessible high-grade ore deposits in Canada. But this ore will not be available in 1943.

Despite these failings in the program, it is only fair to mention the tremendous scope of the undertaking. Not only have facilities for finished and semifinished products been created, and for steel-ingot capacity and pig-iron capacity behind them; there was also provided a huge additional tonnage of coke, ores, and additional transportation to bring the ores to the blast furnaces—all essential to completed task. Only a well-organized and vigorous industry could do this job.

The most vexing aspect of the expansion program is the futile effort and wasted material which have gone into the creation of unnecessary facilities while we are begging for other urgently needed plants.

For the lack of balance of certain types of facilities in the expansion program the armed forces are largely responsible. The armed forces do not have any satisfactory mechanism to determine in advance of a program just how much of each raw material is needed and to recommend this proper amount to the War Production Board. There is an excess of capacity for rolled armor plate. The Army sponsored a 19,000-ton plant to be operated by Carnegie-Illinois at Gary, and then had to shift to other products so far as possible. Much of the plant was so near completion that it was not practical to change it. There is an excess of capacity for forged armor plate. Despite this excess the Carnegie-Illinois Co. is operating not only its own plant at Homestead, Pa., but the Government's Naval Ordnance Plant at South Charleston, W. Va. The committee found that some work that could and should have been done at South Charleston has been diverted to Homestead by keeping particularly skilled workers at Homestead. Both of these plants, as well as two other private companies doing similar work are running below capacity because the demand for their product has gone down. History has shown that the continued operation of the Government-owned plant is necessary and desirable as a means of keeping prices within reason by its very existence.

These overcapacities may be justified on the ground of caution. Facilities of this type cannot be created quickly. Their existence may be considered as insurance, albeit very expensive in terms of materials.

It is much harder to explain the instances where capacity falls short of requirements. As a result of the undercapacities for special alloy steels airplane construction will suffer. Heat-treated steels, forgings, and castings also will not be available in the required quantities. In spite of data which indicated that there was not sufficient heat-treating capacity, various expansions were held up or materially curtailed. Now the shortage is again acute, and will continue to be so as the demand for aircraft steels increases. These shortages could have been avoided if the demand had been foreseen in time. To a great extent they are the result of the armed forces' reluctance to prepare itemized bills of materials to cover their production programs. In one instance coming to the attention of the committee a special alloy steel was tested after deliveries had started and fatigue tests showed a slight variance. The order was canceled necessitating removal of large tonnages of steel from production lines and adapting the steel to the manufacture of another product.

Expansion of mining operations has followed the same pattern as expansion of steel-making facilities. For steel making in the Pittsburgh area by the big companies no ores can compete today with the high grade, cheaply, obtainable Mesaba ores of Minnesota. But in parts of the country distant from Mesaba steelmakers need ore supplies closer at hand. There are many such deposits in proximity to other necessary raw materials, although none are as cheap and plentiful as the Mesaba deposits. Their development, therefore, is dependent on the erection of steel-making facilities in their vicinity. A program has been undertaken to expand the production of iron ore in the eastern States to the extent of 3,750,000 tons, and other projects were initiated to develop production of iron ore in Texas, Southern California, and Utah. However, the vast tonnages in Texas, the South, and the Northwest are hardly being touched. And little use is being made of many fine ore deposits throughout the country because there are not sufficient steel-making facilities at hand.

Some thought is being given to the fact that the easily accessible high grade ores in the Mesaba Range will be depleted in 7 to 14 years at present rates. Further steps should be taken to develop new ore deposits in the country. If the war extends for many years, we shall have to be prepared to find means to continue a high rate of steel production with ores less accessible and of lower quality than the best Mesaba ores. For example, we must learn how to use commercially the huge quantities of taconite ore in the Lake Superior ranges if we are to continue the present steel industry located at Gary, Cleveland, Buffalo, and other points on the shores of the Great Lakes. A proposal to allocate money for testing methods of treating low grade ores has to date received a cold reception at the War Production Board. But the comparatively small sums of money required to test such projects are well justified as insurance for the future. The Axis nations have, by necessity, been forced to improve techniques so as to enable them to use lower grade ores. Each type of ore presents special problems. Farsightedness should dictate a policy of preparedness to meet any similar emergency arising in this country by initiating now our program of research. Moreover, it may be wise, after the war to preserve our best ore deposits for some future emergency period when steel will be needed in quantities obtainable only by stripping a range like Mesaba of its best ores. In this event we should be ready to substitute lower grades and less accessible ores for the peacetime operations of the steel industry.

Another problem in the facilities program was created by the serious shortage of scrap steel. Many proposals were presented for methods of creating high quality melting stock as a substitute for scrap. In essence the majority of these utilized sponge iron processes. The making of sponge iron has been a controversial subject in the steel industry for many years and it is not entirely clear that any of the processes will prove successful for large-scale operations. None the less, some of these offered promise and could have been tried out on a sufficiently large scale with comparatively small expenditures of steel and money.

The matter was delayed, however, until late in 1942 by indulgence in theoretical discussions and attempts to obtain the opinions of scientific authorities, whose statements only emphasized our lack of knowledge and provoked further controversies. The committee had many private discussions on this subject with the War Production Board. Finally, the reorganized Steel Division adopted a logical solution that the expenditure involved in a reasonable working test of the projects with the most promise was justified because of the great need to develop a substitute for high-grade scrap. One proposal has been approved and the others are being considered. The committee agrees that, in view of the scrap situation, the small quantities of steel and money which must be risked are well worth spending on any proposal which appears to have a fair chance of providing large quantities of high-quality scrap. The one project which has been approved to date involves a process which requires high-grade magnetic ores and which would not, even if successful, prove the general utility of sponge-iron processes for other ores. Since high-grade magnetic ores are found in only a few parts of the country and are in great demand, it would be wise to approve at least one project which could use nonmagnetic ores of lower quality.

The War Production Board's experience with sponge iron is indicative of its unwillingness to originate and sponsor experimental projects. The desirability of providing synthetic scrap was clear long before any project was approved. The Steel Division made no effort to sponsor a synthetic scrap project and limited its action to formulating objections to those proposed to it.

INEFFICIENCIES IN UTILIZING EXISTING CAPACITIES

Many inefficiencies in operation, including the methods of collecting and using scrap, failure to utilize most productive melting practices, failure to revise standards, unscientific scheduling of production, and wasteful use of manpower must still be eliminated from the program.

Scrap collection presents the most serious of the unsolved problems. To maintain steel production in 1943, 14,386,000 net tons of purchased scrap will be needed in addition to the home scrap produced by the steel companies. Foundries will require a further 7,806,000 net tons of purchased scrap. This scrap must be found in the collective junk heaps and storerooms of America. While steel can be made with less scrap than the estimated requirements, operations would be seriously hampered and production would decrease substantially. The steel industry today is geared to using large quantities of scrap in its open-hearth furnaces to dilute the carbon content of pig iron in the manufacture of steel. Large quantities of purchased scrap are also needed in making electric-furnace steel. High-grade scrap is required for many operations, so that the most important steels will suffer most seriously if scrap is not found in sufficient quantity and quality.

Sponge-iron experiments cannot be expected to produce any substantial quantities of substitute scrap in 1943, even if wholly successful. The most that could be expected from sponge-iron development for the purpose of producing synthetic scrap would be volume production in 1944 or 1945. If we knew that we could count on such production we could use our existing supplies of scrap freely and rely on sponge iron for the future, but we have no such knowledge. Scrap collection and utilization, therefore, continue to be of vital importance.

The seemingly outmoded Bessemer converter has a new usefulness in connection with the scrap shortage, being used to produce a synthetic scrap which can be fed hot into open-hearth furnaces as readily as high-grade scrap. This practice has been adopted where facilities permit.

Even more useful, however, is the duplexing of bessemer converters with electric furnaces. This is valuable because of the serious shortage of high-grade scrap suitable for electric furnace production and the shortage of electric furnace facilities. Low-grade scrap is fed to a cupola to desulfurize it. The hot metal is then processed in a bessemer converter to remove carbon and silicon. Then it is fed hot into an electric furnace. The electric furnace's capacity is thereby increased 30 percent and its consumption of electricity decreased 50 percent. Where bessemer converters are close enough to electric furnaces to permit this practice they should be so used, as the alloy steels produced by the electric furnaces are critical in our war effort. A large proportion of the great quantity of alloy turnings can be melted in cupolas without appreciable loss of the contained nickel and molybdenum. One serious defect in this procedure is the loss of the contained chrome, and for this reason the subject is still being studied.

The civilian population responded patriotically to the various local scrap campaigns. People have been willing to do their share. But after the initial flourish civilians found that there was no organization established to guide them in their enthusiasm by telling them exactly what to do. Nor are citizens impressed by the sight of huge scrap piles lying unutilized over long periods.

It must be realized that many of the contributions of the individual householder make poor scrap because they are too light and too small. When this scrap is thrown into a furnace, much of it blazes away and is lost to the operation. It also is more difficult to handle and slows down the entire steel-making operation. It must also be realized that former reliable sources of heavy scrap are disappearing. With the conversion of the civilian durable goods industries to war production, people are less prone to junk what they have. Moreover, once the present supply has been junked, no more automobiles and other heavy articles will be available to replace them and in turn be junked. Railroad lines are being rehabilitated where formerly they were torn up and put on the scrap heap. When the heavy steel articles being made today are scrapped, we expect that they will not be available for use by the steel industry because of previous use on the battlefields abroad. In brief, the sources of scrap are drying up, and we must seek new supplies diligently and with an eye to the future.

The scrap collection program has proceeded haphazardly. The Salvage Division, which has succeeded the Bureau of Industrial Conservation, is in charge of finding scrap, of stimulating its flow, and of collecting it. This Division is responsible not for the steel-scrap program but for all salvage operations. It is organized along lines designed to conduct a salvaging job. It has not been able to seek out and find scrap steel to be used as an essential raw material for steel production. The Steel Division has no jurisdiction over the collection of scrap, but merely allocates it after it has been found by the Bureau of Industrial Conservation.

The Bureau has not been able to ascertain the amounts of available scrap or to survey the places where scrap will be found. As a result the collection has been a hand-to-mouth proposition. Scrap dealers are hampered by the labor shortage, complicated regulations as to the use of their equipment, stringent specifications, too much red tape, and lack of centralization of the program. The scrap dealer must cope with the Bureau of Industrial Conservation, with the Office of Defense Transportation, with the War Labor Board, with the priority authorities, and with the Office of Price Administration. Discussions with the War Production Board on the disposition of scrap must usually be suspended until the price has been adjusted by the Office of Price Administration. Scrap prices are too low to enable the dealer to take new measures and to find and haul new and remote sources of supply. Most of the scrap dealers are trying to do their job. The Government should utilize its employees to seek out new sources of scrap steel, rather than to check and recheck the scrap dealers.

One huge store of steel which should be readily subject to requisitioning and collection lay untouched during most of 1942 and to date has not even been inventoried. This is the huge stock pile of steel which pre-war industry, particularly the automobile industry, had on hand when operations were curtailed after Pearl Harbor. Estimates of the aggregate amount of this steel vary, but all agree that there are millions of tons. The quality is good. The War Production Board knows just where to find it, yet to date most of it is still unused and deteriorating, rusting usually in the open air. An organized effort to move these stocks began in the late fall of 1942, and is now under way. Some of it is of quality and type that could be immediately fabricated into such items as farm machinery.

But the farmers of America are being denied steel necessary to make the farm machinery which they and the Department of Agriculture assert is essential to the food program. The Petroleum Administrator cannot get steel for sorely needed pipe lines and barges. The railroads cannot get steel for cars, and the Maritime Commission cannot get steel for ships.

Other serious problems to be solved are the present waste of scrap due to failure of steel fabricators to segregate the various classes of scrap and due to the failure of the industry to absorb alloy steel turnings. There is in effect an order requiring segregation, but only the large producers have complied. The average scrap producer mixes all types of steel with the result that much of his scrap is wasted. The segregation order must be enforced. Alloy steel turnings now run about 100,000 tons a month. The steel companies advise that they cannot utilize over 40,000 tons a month with present facilities for preparing the scrap for melting. The Iron and Steel Branch and the Industry Advisory Committee were advised a year ago that there would be 100,000 tons a month of alloy turnings, but practically nothing has been done to handle this quantity. The alloying elements in the wasted scrap are of prime importance and vigorous efforts must now be taken to find a way of recovering the alloying metals in these turnings.

This is no time for halfway measures. The entire steel scrap collection program should be revamped. Ultimate responsibility for finding scrap for steel, as contrasted to salvage operations, should be in the hands of the Steel Division with power in that Division to issue necessary directives to the Salvage Division. The steel scrap collection program is no mere matter of salvage and conservation. It goes to the very heart of production.

Reports have come to the committee that the steel companies could operate more efficiently if production schedules were better adjusted to their particular facilities. The Steel Division cannot wait for the companies voluntarily to take action which would disturb their customer relations. Mills should not be permitted to roll various sizes of a given product where each particular size could be assigned to the particular mill best equipped for the job. Substantial production time and manpower is lost during time spent on turn-overs from one type of job to another. Some items, which should be used extensively, are not in demand because of the price structure. Low-alloy steels sell at prices higher than high-alloy steels, with a resultant waste of the alloying elements in cases where carbon or low-alloy steel would be satisfactory; the various ferro-alloy prices result in a tendency to produce the most profitable products rather than those which help the most in conservation. The solution of this problem is in the hands of the Office of Price Administration. Prices should be adjusted to equalize profits or to make the more important products the most profitable.

The priority system also has affected production adversely in many instances. Under heretofore existing conditions steel companies have had to produce the items with highest priority numbers first, whereas they would be able to operate more efficiently if they could schedule a total maximum output of all products for a particular period and produce them in such a way as to achieve maximum efficiency. This condition will probably be cured when the Steel Division puts into effect a more inclusive production-directives system and integrates this with the controlled-materials plan. Under this system the mills will be specifically instructed with respect to the particular items they must produce in each month, with due consideration given to the plant's backlog of orders and its particular problems.

Abandonment of the priority system in favor of specific allocations will also eliminate other less important factors which unbalanced production. In the past the customer with the low priority number could shop around for a mill with a small backlog to fill his order, while another customer with a high priority number would go unsatisfied if he ordered his steel from a producer with a large backlog. Most large corporations maintained a retinue of scouts in the field to cope with this situation. The new system should eliminate these mechanical difficulties and also enable the War Production Board to know exactly how steel is being utilized. With such information it should be able to insure that the most important needs are satisfied first and that war production is maintained at the highest possible rate.

The system alone will not solve the problem. One situation which requires careful consideration is due to orders for certain types of products being placed seasonally in some cases, such as tin plate; this creates a serious problem. A large crew is required to turn out the job in a hurry when the pyramided orders arrive. In order to keep experienced crews of workers available against the time when the orders come in, the mills have shown a tendency to hoard these men. Although tin-plate production has been considerably curtailed for some time, manufacturers have believed that the packing of the incoming large food crop will result in a sudden rush for all available tinplate capacity. When it does come, they will need a full and experienced crew. Accordingly, workers are being held on although not needed. It would be preferable to place orders for this type of material well in advance, and to space production to avoid peaks and depressions, thus enabling the mills to utilize their plant and personnel uniformly over a long period of time and to release those workers whom it otherwise tries to save to handle a rush of work.

Specifications also should be reexamined with a view to making sure that they are not too exacting with a resultant loss in production. Wherever it is possible to relax specifications without sacrificing military effectiveness, this should be done. We cannot afford to sacrifice materials needed now to gain additional durability for articles which will certainly do their job and outlast the war. The new national emergency alloy steels do the job of old alloy steels and save substantial quantities of scarce metals. The Steel Division should take positive action to require the use of these steels, and the Office of Price Administration should look into the price situation with respect to them. At present high prices for these steels set by the steel companies are proving a deterrent to their use.

Centrifugal castings and pressure castings should be used more freely as a substitute for forgings and rolled bars. Consumers have been reluctant to make the change, although the castings have proved their merit and save great quantities of steel. Many forgings utilize as little as 15 percent of the steel which goes into their making, whereas in equivalent castings the yield often is as high as 80 percent. The finished casting requires much less machining than a forging. The change-over would not result in junking equipment. There is more than enough demand for all the forging facilities that would be available even if centrifugal and pressure castings were widely used. New equipment for this purpose can be built quickly and with much less critical material than rolling and forging facilities.

Testimony developed at the committee's hearings showed that orders for sheet steel were assigned to large mills, with equipment to produce a variety of items, whereas small mills equipped only to roll light sheet were operating far below capacity.

The committee recommended that, insofar as practicable, the small mills be given orders which would enable them to continue in business and at the same time release for other work facilities and employees of the large mills with varied operations to the extent of the work that can be given to the smaller mills. The manpower situation, in particular, would warrant this, since the small mills have their manpower at hand. If they are forced out of business, the manpower will drift away, probably to other industries, and certainly away from the housing facilities they now occupy, whereas the large mills could readily use the manpower which they themselves would release if they gave up some of these operations. To date, however, this situation has not been much improved, and the committee is of the opinion that more could be done to aid the small mill and at the same time help the war effort.

The Bessemer steel capacity of the country is not being fully utilized to date. In connection with the discussion of scrap in this report, the committee concluded that Bessemer converters would be most useful where duplexed in operation with open-hearth and electric furnaces. This is possible only where the two are close enough to permit the feeding of hot steel from the Bessemer to the open-hearth or electric furnace. But there are many Bessemer converters in places where such duplexing would not be feasible, and these are not producing Bessemer steel up to capacity. This steel is not suitable for most military purposes, due to its lower ductility. Nevertheless, it can be used to fill many essential needs which otherwise would go unfilled. Pre-war specifications, however, shunned Bessemer steel, and the armed forces and industry in general have not yet been willing to use it for purposes where they were accustomed to use open-hearth steel. Bessemer should be specified wherever possible.

DISTRIBUTION OF STEEL PRODUCTS

The controlled materials plan is rapidly being put into effect. Under it the armed forces and other consumers will state in advance exactly what they need and allocations will be specifically made to the extent that the materials are available. The principles underlying the plan appear to be sound, but its success will depend almost entirely upon how it is administered. Actual operation and practice have not yet proceeded far enough to enable an accurate appraisal of its efficiency to be made.

The priorities system of distribution depended on assigning an arbitrary priority designation to a particular steel purchase. The priority number was based on the best approximation of the urgency status of the particular purchase and the relative importance of the item to be produced as related to the entire defense program. No steps were taken to prevent a steel plant from favoring production of more profitable items over other items having a higher priority status. Nor was any program evolved to equalize the distribution of urgent priority orders uniformly between the various steel manufacturers. As a result, astute purchasers with low priority ratings were able to place their orders with manufacturers having less of the higher priority commitments and thereby improved their ratings.

The priority system was further predicated on the theory that the priorities would absorb all the ingot produced in order of their ratings flowing progressively from the highest to the lower ratings until all the production found its way into the program. But in actual practice many urgent programs with high priority ratings went begging for steel, while large tonnages of low priority ratings were being filled.

The black markets disclosed in the steel industry were patronized by producers of vital items who were unable to get quick deliveries of steel in any other way. These black markets were able to exist because of the absence of control of less than carload lots. A few jobbers took advantage of this to sell at exhorbitant prices, with a resultant disarrangement of the price and priority system. Black markets must be constantly sought out and eliminated when found. On the other hand, the jobbers can perform a most valuable function by stocking odd items of which individual purchasers order small quantities.

Under the priorities system, a shipyard could pile up inventories of plate even though failure of other deliveries made the plate useless. Low priority numbers on some items could and did hold up construction jobs which had high ratings on other items.

The Steel Division should check very carefully accumulations of large inventories at this time when so many urgent needs have not been satisfied. The armed forces, and some Navy shipyards in particular have supplies on hand for many months, in some instances for 8 to 10 months. Each case should be examined to determine whether, without prejudice to the war effort, the steel could be put to immediate use, and replaced by later production.

With programs as important as the synthetic rubber, oil pipe line, shipbuilding construction, and farm machinery, begging for steel, we cannot afford to wonder where steel ingot is going.

It is essential that every ton of steel produced by every mill be specifically allocated to the most important work at hand. It is essential that so far as possible this allocation be carried back as far as the ingot so that the quantities of each type produced can be adjusted to the facilities for finishing the most urgently needed products. This requires considerable planning and effort. It will require primarily that the armed forces determine their needs and state them correctly, conservatively, and in sufficient time to permit proper planning. It will emphasize, though not increase, the dangers of asking for the wrong finished products and then changing specifications in the midst of production. It should greatly lessen the all too prevalent practice of asking for too much on the theory that that is the best way to assure getting at least enough.

If this program is to be successful, the Army and the Navy will have to cooperate in it. There is too little leeway in the over-all requirements estimates for 1943 to justify any extravagance or waste. In the steel program, the requirements of the armed forces compete, not just with essential civilian requirements, but with programs essential to the actual fighting of the war.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1446) authorizing appropriations for the United States

Navy for additional ship-repair facilities, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 1446) authorizing appropriations for the United States Navy for additional ship-repair facilities, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

INFLATION—BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, we have been told for many months of the great danger of inflation. The President of the United States himself has sent us several messages dwelling on the damage which it would cause, and last September he regarded it as such a tremendous danger that he threatened to fix prices and wages himself without legal authority if Congress did not act promptly on the anti-inflation measure. I agree that a serious inflation would create hardship and injustice among our citizens and, if carried to extremes, might destroy our whole financial and economic structure.

I was the more surprised, therefore, to learn of the action of the Federal Reserve Board taken in December, resulting in the issue of $660,000,000 of Federal Reserve bank notes, which are the exact equivalent of greenbacks. I do not know any policy more likely to bring about inflation than the issue of paper currency without reserves and resting for its value entirely on the unsecured promise of the Government of the United States. In the name of preventing inflation, one department of the Government is subjecting the people to every form of Fascist control in the regulation of prices, wages, and rationing, while another department is engaged in inflating the currency.

On January 21 I addressed a letter to the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and another letter to the Secretary of the Treasury. I have received replies describing the procedure taken in connection with the issuance of $660,000,000 of Federal Reserve bank notes. I assume the facts to be as stated in those letters, but they do not change in any way my condemnation of the procedure.

I ask that the letters be printed at the close of my remarks, together with the enclosures, so that the whole story may be in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letters may be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. TAFT. These Federal Reserve bank notes are being issued under section 18 of the Federal Reserve Act of 1913, as it was amended in 1933, at the time of the bank crisis. Amended section 18 was passed while the banks were closed, in order to provide a liberal supply of currency, in case there should be any runs on the banks when they were opened. That was its only purpose, and it provides that no note shall be issued under it after the President has declared by proclamation that the emergency recognized by him by proclamation of March 6, 1933, has terminated.

In other words, an act was passed for an emergency which existed in 1933. It was expressly provided that if the President should declare that emergency to be ended, the statute should be void. It happens that the President never has declared that emergency to be ended. I do not think he has ever declared to be ended any of the hundreds of emergencies which have occurred since 1933. The result is that legally this statute is still in effect. That emergency apparently never has been formally terminated, and so the Treasury now takes action under this act.

The act authorized any Federal Reserve bank to deposit Government bonds or commercial paper with the Treasury, and against the security of such obligations to issue its own notes, known as Federal Reserve bank notes. Any bank could bring its assets to the Federal Reserve bank, therefore, and the Federal Reserve bank could issue this currency to it in return. It was recognized at the time that this was not a permanently sound procedure, because it resulted in effect in the monetization of the national debt, that is, when bonds were actually deposited. Under the present action no bonds are deposited, but it is not a sound procedure even when bonds are deposited. It was not extensively used, only $265,000,000 being issued in 1933, and all but $18,000,000 of these have since been retired. Those eighteen million are apparently in safety deposit boxes, or lost, or have in some way disappeared.

Apparently someone in the Treasury found in some back drawer $660,000,000 of these notes which had been printed and never used in 1933, and he got the bright idea that they might as well be issued now. So a method was devised which is even more unsound than the original issue of the notes under emergency conditions.

Another provision of section 18 provides the method by which these Federal Reserve bank notes can be retired, that method being the same as the one pursued in the retirement of national-bank notes, that is, the notes issued by the ordinary national banks prior to the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act.

If any national bank or any Federal Reserve bank desires to retire any of these notes, it may deposit cash with the Treasury and take back its collateral. Thereupon it is provided that the liability for the note is transferred to the United States, and the national bank or the Federal Reserve bank is released from further liability. It is intended, of course, that this shall result promptly in the retirement of the notes. So apparently what happened in this case is that the Federal Reserve Board ordered the Federal Reserve banks, who knew nothing about the matter and had no need for such currency, to issue a proportion of these notes. Each Federal Reserve bank took its Government bonds and deposited them as collateral with the Federal Reserve agent. At least, that is what is claimed. They are not there now.

Immediately, and apparently as part of the same transaction, it notified the Treasury of its intention to retire the notes, withdraw its collateral, and meet the requirement for the deposit of cash by setting up a credit to the Treasury on its own books. Thereupon it relieved itself of any liability on the new Federal Reserve bank notes, and this liability was transferred to the United States. These Federal Reserve bank notes have apparently never appeared in any statement as a liability of any Federal Reserve bank. The net result of this transaction is that there are now outstanding $660,000,000 of Federal Reserve bank notes, against which there is no collateral, which are not liabilities of the Federal Reserve banks, but are liabilities of the Government of the United States. No effort was made to retire these notes, although probably they were still in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks, but they are being issued to the public from time to time. The net legal effect is the same as if the United States had issued greenbacks in the same sum. It is stated on the face of the notes that they are liabilities of the Federal Reserve banks, and that bonds have been deposited to secure their payment, but these are not facts. At least, they are no longer liabilities of the Federal Reserve bank, and no bonds are now deposited for their payment.

It may be that the procedure followed is legal, and that these notes are legal obligations of the United States. That is the opinion of Mr. Dreibelbis, general attorney of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, whose opinion is attached. Certainly Congress never intended such an issue to take place, and there is a complete violation of the spirit of the law. In the first place, Congress made clear its intention that no such notes should be issued after the 1933 emergency came to an end. The statement issued by the Federal Reserve Board frankly says that—

> Authority for Federal Reserve banks to issue Federal Reserve bank notes will expire when the President proclaims that the emergency recognized in his proclamation of March 6, 1933, has terminated.

Apparently no such proclamation terminating the bank emergency of 1933 is expected. It is quite true that the President has declared many emergencies since that time; but I have never heard of anyone claiming that that particular emergency is still in effect.

Secondly, the act was certainly passed for the benefit of the Federal Reserve banks to supply them with currency when they needed it. In the present case these banks knew nothing about the matter until they were ordered to take out the notes. It will be noted that the Secretary of the Treasury says that these notes are being issued by the Federal Reserve banks at the direction of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. There is nothing in the law which gives the Board of Governors power to issue any such order. However, the Federal Reserve banks ordinarily comply with what they are requested to do.

Thirdly, the statute permitting the retirement of the notes and the transfer of liability to the United States is not being complied with in good faith. The United States was only supposed to assume a liability between the time when the need for the notes had come to an end, as indicated by the banks' desire to retire them, and the time when they could be retired. It was merely a step in the process of retirement. Instead of that, the notes are permitted to be issued after the notice of retirement has been given, and apparently it is the intention to keep the notes in circulation more or less indefinitely. The statement of the Federal Reserve Board says that—

The Federal Reserve bank notes will be canceled and retired as they become unfit for circulation.

In other words, when they are torn to pieces or worn out they will be retired, after a period of perhaps 3 or 4 years.

It may well be a number of years before this condition exists. I even question whether Government bonds were ever really handed to the Federal Reserve agent, although I assume that he perhaps saw them for a minute or two. Perhaps they were put in his hands for that purpose.

Fourthly, the procedure was so simultaneous that I rather doubt whether there was any moment at which the Federal Reserve banks were liable to anyone on these notes. Apparently they still held the notes when they withdrew their collateral. If so, the notes never were outstanding, and never were in fact Federal Reserve bank notes.

It is argued by the Board in effect that since they are issuing so many bonds anyway, it does not make much difference whether the unsecured notes are issued or not. Of course, that begs the question. Furthermore, these notes are a little worse form of currency than any other to which we have resorted. The Civil War greenbacks, of which there are still $346,000,000 outstanding, are secured by a 45-percent reserve of gold. The Federal Reserve notes are secured by reserves in gold of not less than 40 percent. Silver certificates are secured by silver, usually to the full value of the certificates. Bank deposits, both in commercial banks and in Federal Reserve banks, must have adequate reserves. But here is a series of notes resting solely on the promise of the Government of the United States, without collateral of any kind.

I realize that it is impossible at the present time entirely to avoid an inflationary procedure with reference to the currency, but there are certainly far more sound and conservative methods of dealing with the currency than this one. Fundamentally, inflation is caused by the creation of purchasing power through Government borrowing. Ultimately, the only way to avoid inflation is to reduce expenses, raise more taxes, and sell bonds to individuals and institutions which have really saved the money and have it available for investment. In time of war it is almost impossible to secure any great reduction in expenses. We are undertaking to tax up to the very limit that the people can bear without suffering more harm than the avoidance of inflation will do good. Even though we go the limit on taxation, the Government will have to borrow from fifty to sixty billion dollars next year. The most important policy for the Treasury to pursue is to put on a complete and all-inclusive bond-selling campaign to get the money, not by issuing notes, but by selling bonds to the people in return for their savings. It must provide the kind of bonds that people in different situations are interested in buying. It must sell those bonds by a house-to-house canvass on the same basis on which we conduct our Community Chest campaign.

For the first time, in December the Treasury turned toward such a policy, but even then $5,000,000,000 of the $12,000,000,000 of bonds sold were sold to commercial banks. The sale of bonds to commercial banks is simply the creation of purchasing power out of thin air, for the deposits created are passed on by the Government to individuals who have the money to spend. The holdings of commercial banks have increased approximately $10,000,000,000 in 1 year, and will increase more than twice that amount in the next year if we do not do a better job of selling bonds. The holdings of the Federal Reserve banks have increased approximately $3,700,000,000 dollars in 1 year. For various reasons the amount of currency outstanding has increased more than $3,000,000,000 in 1 year. If this inflationary process continues, I do not care how strong we make the dike of price control and wage control, it will be swept away by the flood of paper.

I have to admit that the sale of bonds to commercial banks has ultimately about the same result as the issue of unsecured paper money such as I have been discussing, but there is a substantial difference in the nature of the process. In the first place, the commercial banks do not have to buy bonds unless they wish to do so, and they cannot do so unless their resulting situation provides sufficient reserves. In other words, there is a limit to the process of selling bonds to commercial banks. The least dangerous form of inflation, therefore, is this method, which has been pursued too liberally by the Treasury up to this time.

The second method of financing the Government through inflation, somewhat more dangerous than that of selling bonds to the commercial banks, is the purchase of bonds in the open market by the Federal Reserve banks. This process has been authorized for years, and as a balance wheel to meet an increased or decreased volume of business, it is generally recognized as sound. When it is used, however, as it is now being used and has been used during the past year, to help finance the Government's war program, it is distinctly inflationary. I have pointed out that the Federal Reserve banks have increased their holdings of bonds by $3,700,000,000, and evidently they intend to go on increasing their holdings. The effect of this is to increase the bank reserves and to make it easier for the Treasury to sell bonds to the banks.

A still more inflationary procedure consists in the direct sale of Government bonds to the Federal Reserve banks. This was authorized by statute last year over my protest, and I understand that it has been used by the Treasury, although when the bill was passed they denied any intention of making use of it except temporarily to assist financing over tax day.

Finally, the most inflationary method of all, psychologically and practically, is the direct issue of paper money. Unfortunately, the statutes already permit this to be done in several ways. They permit it to be done in the case of silver certificates. Without further action by Congress, the Government today could issue $1,700,000,000 worth of additional silver certificates, representing the difference between the actual cost of the Government's silver and $1.29 an ounce, the monetary value. I hope the Government will not do so. So far, the Treasury has apparently no intention of doing so.

As a practical matter, however, the issue of this money while it would be pure inflation, would at least provide a substantial reserve behind the notes; because of course there would be that silver; and while it would not be for 100 percent, it still would be for from 50 percent to 60 percent of the face amount of the notes.

There is also some authority under certain circumstances to issue $3,000,000,000 worth of greenbacks under the Thomas amendment of 1933.

Now, Mr. President, the Treasury has dug up another method of printing paper money, and I should say that it falls in the most dangerous class of inflationary action. I might point out that if the Treasury can do this at all, if the Treasury can issue the $660,000,000 worth of notes—notes which were printed 10 years ago—it can also go on printing the notes in unlimited quantities. It can increase the issue from $660,000,000 to $10,000,000,000. If there is statutory authority for the issuance of $660,000,000 worth of notes there is statutory authority for issuing $10,000,000,000 worth of the notes. So the situation presents a wide-open field for pure inflationary issuance of paper money.

It is difficult for me to see how any responsible official of the United States Government can deliberately favor the issuance of unsecured paper money and at the same time inveigh against the dangers of inflation. The Federal Reserve bank notes should be immediately retired, and Congress should repeal the act which authorizes their issuance.

I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce a bill for that purpose.

The bill (S. 658) to repeal the sixth paragraph of section 18 of the Federal Reserve Act was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

EXHIBIT A

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, January 26, 1943.

Hon. ROBERT A. TAFT,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR TAFT: This is in reply to your letter of January 21 in which you inquire whether in the issuance of $660,000,000 of Federal Reserve bank notes the provisions of section 18 of the Federal Reserve Act have been complied with and requesting also an explanation of the exact procedure followed in the issuance of these notes.

With regard to the legality of the issue, I enclose a memorandum opinion by the general attorney of the Board which shows conclusively that the notes were issued in strict compliance with the law and the regulations thereunder. With respect to the procedure, I attach a memorandum prepared by the staff which gives the details of the procedure followed. You will note that it is in conformity with procedure followed in the past, both with respect to Federal Reserve bank notes and national bank notes.

In addition, I enclose a memorandum which Dr. Goldenweiser, Director of our Division of Research and Statistics, informally prepared after reading the open letter sent to Congress by the secretary of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy. Dr. Goldenweiser fully explained the matter over the telephone to the writer of this open letter and felt indignant that nevertheless the open letter had been sent in the light of the facts and the disturbance of public confidence which could result from a deliberate distortion of the truth.

I trust that this material will acquaint you fully with the facts, but if you desire more information, please do not hesitate to call upon me.

Sincerely yours,

M. S. ECCLES, Chairman.

Walter E. Spahr, professor of economics at New York University, and secretary of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy, addressed an open letter to Congress on January 20, 1943. In this letter he says that the issuance of Federal Reserve bank notes by the Treasury up to $660,000,000, or any other amount, is not authorized by law; that these notes must be issued by the Federal Reserve banks; that they are not being issued by these banks and are not liabilities of these banks, and that the statement on the face of these notes, that they are secured by United States Government obligations is a falsehood.

First, as to the law: The law and regulations thereunder authorize the Federal Reserve banks to issue Federal Reserve bank notes against Government securities pledged for the purpose and to extinguish their liability on these notes by depositing lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States. When the Reserve banks' liability has been extinguished in this manner, they are at liberty to withdraw the Government securities that were pledged against the notes. What was done is precisely that. The notes were issued by the Reserve banks and Government securities were pledged against them. Lawful money was deposited with the Treasurer of the United States by giving the Treasury a deposit account at the Federal Reserve banks, which is withdrawable at any time in gold certificates, silver certificates, or any other lawful money. In this way the liability on the notes was extinguished, and the securities back of the notes were then withdrawn.

The accusation that the words "secured by United States bonds" on the notes is a falsehood is specious. It is true that they are no longer secured by bonds because of the series of transactions which has been described. But they are secured "by like deposit of other securities" to wit, lawful money. The transaction is identical with the course followed in the case of Federal Reserve bank notes in 1921–24 and 1934–35. It is identical with the course pursued at the time that national bank notes were taken over from the national banks and made liabilities of the Treasury. These notes, the same as Federal Reserve bank notes, are no longer secured by United States obligations but by lawful money and require no other collateral.

The particular point that Mr. Spahr makes about the notes being labeled "national currency" would be puzzling if one did not know how it happened, as he should know. The reason the words "national currency" appear on these notes is that at the time of the banking holiday in 1933, when it became necessary to be prepared to meet currency withdrawals in case they should continue after the banks reopened, it was essential to print the notes in a hurry. For this purpose existing plates of national bank notes were used, with some overprinting. This was in accordance with law which provides that the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to determine the form of any United States currency that is issued.

The next question is as to the good faith of the Board when it stated that the purpose of issuing these notes was to save the paper and manpower necessary for printing other notes. The fact is that that was the sole purpose of the issue. These notes were in existence, they were lying idle, and it would have taken 225,000 man-hours, 45 tons of paper and some other scarce materials to produce a supply of other notes.

It is true that the Treasury, as a result of this transaction, got the use of $660,000,000 without interest for the period until these notes will have been retired. That this was not one of the objects of the issue is apparent, however, from the circumstances surrounding the issue. It costs the Treasury about three-eighths of 1 percent a year to borrow the money which it would have had to have if the notes had not been issued in the manner indicated. But in that case the Federal Reserve banks would have had to pay the Treasury one-half of 1 percent tax on the notes, so that, as a matter of fact, the Treasury sustained a nominal loss as a result of using the method of issuing the notes that was adopted.

All this, however, is within the realm of reasonable discussion and debate. But, beyond this point, Professor Spahr proceeds into a long discussion based on the supposition that the Federal Reserve bank notes will add $660,000,000 to the reserves of the Federal Reserve banks; that this amount will support, in round numbers, $1,900,000,000 of Federal Reserve bank deposits, and that this, in turn, will support about $9,500,000,000 of member bank deposits, or, if reserve requirements are reduced to 10 percent, as the law permits, it will support nineteen billions of member bank deposits.

It is in the figure of nineteen billions of deposits added to the paying medium of the country that Professor Spahr sees danger to the economy and inconsistency with the policy of the Government in trying to prevent inflation. The facts of the matter are that the $660,000,000 are not being added to the Federal Reserve banks' reserves, since they are being paid out into circulation as fast as there is a demand for them. A delay of some weeks in some instances may occur where the notes are in denominations of $50 and $100, which do not circulate rapidly. All of the notes, however, will be paid out in a relatively short time.

The other and much more important fact is that even if those notes were added to the reserves of the Federal Reserve banks this would be an act of supererogation. The Reserve banks now have eleven billions of excess reserves. On the basis of these reserves, following Mr. Spahr's calculations, they could build up a member bank-deposit structure of $300,000,000,000, in comparison with which the professor's nineteen billions would fade into insignificance. To build up a vast monster of inflationary danger by assuming such an addition to the reserves of the Reserve banks (even if it should occur, as it will not) and then to accuse the Government of an improper act on that score is to exceed the boundaries of responsible discussion.

ISSUANCE AND RETIREMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANK NOTES

JANUARY 23, 1943.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS:

(Mr. Dreibelbis, General Attorney.)

On December 12, 1943, the Board authorized the Federal Reserve banks to utilize the existing stock of currency known as Federal Reserve bank notes amounting to approximately $660,000,000. This currency is the remainder of a supply printed in 1933 and is identical with the Federal Reserve bank notes now in circulation.

I am informed that the procedure followed in issuing, redeeming and retiring Federal Reserve bank notes has been and is as follows. Government securities are pledged with the Federal Reserve agent as agent for the Comptroller of the Currency and upon their deposit the Federal Reserve agent delivers Federal Reserve bank notes to the Federal Reserve bank. However, it has been the practice of the Federal Reserve banks to reduce or extinguish their liability on such notes by establishing credits in the Treasurer's general account. When the credit has been established, the collateral is returned to the banks and subsequent retirement or redemption of the notes is effected by charges to the account.

My opinion has been requested as to the legal authority for this procedure.

The issuance and retirement of such notes are governed by the provisions of paragraph 6 of section 18 of the Federal Reserve Act and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury issued pursuant thereto.

The pertinent provisions of paragraph 6 of section 18 of the Federal Reserve Act read as follows:

"Upon deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, (a) of any direct obligations of the United States * * * any Federal Reserve bank making such deposit in the manner prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes in blank, duly registered and countersigned. * * * The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered to prescribe regulations governing the issuance, redemption, replacement, retirement, and destruction of such circulating notes and the release and substitution of security therefor. * * * No such circulating notes shall be issued under this paragraph after the President has declared by proclamation that the emergency recognized by the President by proclamation of March 6, 1933, has terminated, unless such circulating notes are secured by deposits of bonds of the United States bearing the circulation privilege. When required to do so by the Secretary of the Treasury, each Federal Reserve agent shall act as agent of the Treasurer of the United States or of the Comptroller of the Currency, or both, for the performance of any of the functions which the Treasurer or the Comptroller may be called upon to perform in carrying out the provisions of this paragraph."

On March 11, 1933, Secretary of the Treasury Woodin issued a regulation which provides for the issuance of such notes and the deposit and maintenance of collateral as security therefor. The pertinent provisions of this regulation will be found in paragraphs 1 and 4 which read as follows:

"1. The Federal Reserve agent accredited to each Federal Reserve bank is hereby authorized and required to act as the agent of the Treasurer of the United States or of the Comptroller of the Currency, or both, for the performance of any of the functions which the Treasurer or the Comptroller may be called upon to perform in carrying out the provisions of such sixth paragraph of section 18, as amended. The term 'Federal Reserve agent' as used in this regulation shall be construed to mean the Federal Reserve agent as agent of the Treasurer of the United States or of the Comptroller of the Currency, or both, as the case may be."

* * * * *

"4. Upon deposit with the Federal Reserve agent of the security required by such sixth paragraph of section 18, as amended, the Federal Reserve agent may deliver Federal Reserve bank notes to the Federal Reserve bank to which he is accredited."

On March 31, 1933, Acting Secretary of the Treasury A. A. Ballantine issued a regulation which provides for the retirement of such notes. The pertinent provisions of this regulation will be found in paragraphs 5 and 7 which read as follows:

"5. Deposits by Federal Reserve banks for credit in the redemption fund provided for under paragraph 10 of the regulations approved March 11, 1933, [or deposits to retire Federal Reserve bank notes as hereinafter povided may be made by credits in the Treasurer's general account or by payment through the gold settlement fund]". (Language in brackets indicates our emphasis.)

* * * * *

"7. Any Federal Reserve bank may at any time retire its Federal Reserve bank notes by the deposit of such notes with its Federal Reserve agent, or may reduce its liability for outstanding Federal Reserve bank notes by the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States, and upon delivery to the agent by the bank of any of its Federal Reserve bank notes, or upon advice from the Treasurer [or the Federal Reserve bank] [1] that a deposit of lawful money has been made by the bank for retirement of its Federal Reserve bank notes, the agent shall have general authority to surrender an equivalent amount of collateral to the bank. Any Federal Reserve bank notes surrendered to the Federal Reserve agent by the bank may be reissued to the bank only on the basis of an original issue. The Federal Reserve agent shall daily report to the Treasurer of the United States, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Federal Reserve Board the amount of Federal Reserve bank notes surrendered by the bank."

You are advised that, in my opinion, the procedure outlined above meets the legal requirements of section 18 of the Federal Reserve Act and the applicable regulations issued thereunder.

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO ISSUANCE OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANK NOTES

In December 1942 the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, with the approval of the Treasury Department, authorized the Federal Reserve banks to pay out the existing stock, approximately $660,000,000, of Federal bank notes which were printed in 1933. This was done to help meet the extraordinary demands for currency and at the same time conserve thousands of man-hours and valuable materials for other purposes. It was estimated that there would be a saving of 225,000 man-hours in printing alone and 45 tons of paper, in addition to substantial quantities of nylon and ink.

The issuance of Federal Reserve bank notes was authorized in the Federal Reserve Act as originally drawn in 1913. Such notes were issued during the period 1916–20, and again in 1933, when a shortage of currency appeared imminent at the time of the bank holiday. About $912,000,000 of Federal Reserve bank notes were printed in 1933 (none have been printed since that date), of which about $265,000,000 were issued to member banks for circulation purposes. Between February 28, 1934, when $194,000,000 of Federal Reserve bank notes were in circulation, and March 1, 1935, the various Federal Reserve banks extinguished their liability for Federal Reserve bank notes then outstanding by depositing an equal amount of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States for their redemption, as provided in the Treasury Department's regulations of March 31, 1933, covering the issue and redemption of Federal Reserve bank notes. From then on the Federal Reserve banks had no liability for Federal Reserve bank notes in circulation. About $18,000,000 of these Federal Reserve bank notes are still in circulation.

In 1935 a similar procedure was followed in extinguishing the liability of national banks for approximately $654,000,000 of national bank notes which were in circulation at the end of July 1935, when the Secretary of the Treasury called for redemption all United States securities available as collateral for currency issued by national banks. The national banks deposited lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States for the redemption of their bank notes then outstanding, and thereupon the liability for such notes was assumed by the United States. There are still about $135,000,000 of national bank notes in circulation

The Federal Reserve bank notes now being put into circulation are issued by the Federal Reserve banks in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act and regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. For all notes issued to the Federal Reserve banks, Government securities were deposited by the Reserve banks with the Federal Reserve agents, acting as agents of the Comptroller of the Currency, pursuant to Treasury Department regulations. Instead, however, of leaving the bonds pledged with Federal Reserve agents as collateral for Federal Reserve bank notes issued by them to the Federal Reserve banks, and showing such notes as a liability, the Federal Reserve banks secured the release of the bonds by depositing lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in an amount sufficient to redeem all Federal Reserve bank notes issued to them. The Federal Reserve bank notes will be canceled and retired as they become unfit for circulation.

If the Federal Reserve banks had left Government bonds pledged as security for Federal Reserve bank notes they would under the law have paid a tax of one-fourth percent semiannually upon the average amount of such notes in circulation. The method followed has the effect of relieving the Federal Reserve banks of the payment of the tax, and member bank reserves will be temporarily increased as the funds deposited in the United States Treasurer's general account are checked out. This effect on member-bank reserves will be reversed as the Federal Reserve bank notes are redeemed and retired from circulation.

Authority for Federal Reserve banks to issue Federal Reserve bank notes will expire when the President proclaims that the emergency recognized in his proclamation of March 6, 1933, has terminated.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 1, 1943.

Hon. ROBERT A. TAFT,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is in reply to your letter of January 21, 1943, in which you make several inquiries with respect to the issuance of Federal Reserve bank notes.

These notes, as you know, are being issued by the Federal Reserve banks at the direction of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The Board of Governors consulted the Treasury prior to directing their issuance and the Treasury approved this action.

All steps taken in connection with the issuance of these notes have been in compliance with the applicable statutes and regulations, and were approved by counsel for the Board of Governors and for the Treasury. I understand that you have already been furnished with a memorandum opinion by Mr. J. P. Dreibelbis, general attorney of the Board of Governors, fully explaining the legal basis of the action. Our own counsel concur in the conclusions reached in this opinion.

The issuance of the existing stock of Federal Reserve bank notes will result in a substantial saving of money. As Professor Spahr says in his so-called open letter to Congress, this saving will accrue immediately to the benefit of the Federal Reserve banks which are required by law to reimburse the Treasury for all expenses connected with the preparation of Federal Reserve bank notes. The saving will ultimately fall into the Treasury, however, as it will add that much to the surplus of the Federal Reserve banks which is the property of the United States subject to the disposition of Congress. More importantly, the issuance of Federal Reserve bank notes will result in substantial savings of scarce labor and strategic materials which cannot be adequately evaluated in terms of money.

Federal Reserve bank notes from the existing stock of $660,000,000 are being issued only as needed for actual circulation and will not be added to the reserves of the Federal Reserve banks. Even if they were so added, the issue would be negligible as the Federal Reserve banks have a very large amount of excess reserves. The issuance of Federal Reserve bank notes is no more inflationary than the issuance of a corresponding amount of Federal Reserve notes.

I am taking the liberty in this connection of sending you a copy of a memorandum on the economic effects of the issuance of Federal Reserve bank notes by Dr. E. A. Goldenweiser, director of research and statistics of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. I understand that a copy of this memorandum has already been transmitted to you by Chairman Eccles. I agree completely with Dr. Goldenweiser's comments and share his indignation, referred to in Chairman Eccles' letter to you, that Dr. Spahr should have chosen to issue his "open letter" in the face of the actual facts of the situation.

Very truly yours,

D. W. BELL,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

OFFICE OF WAR MOBILIZATION—REFERENCE OF BILL

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion in regard to Senate bill 607, to establish an Office of War Mobilization, and for other purposes, introduced by my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] and other distinguished colleagues.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there will be some discussion of the motion and the bill, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MCNARY. Just a moment. Did the Senator from North Carolina complete his motion?

[1] Language in brackets inserted by amendment dated December 14, 1942, to permit alternative advice by the Federal Reserve bank.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I was about to give my reasons as to why I thought the bill should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think the Senator completed his motion. He did not actually make the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Then, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is constrained to inform the Senator that he will first have to make a motion to have the bill taken up for consideration.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 607) to establish an Office of War Mobilization, and for other purposes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I now move that Senate bill 607 be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is debatable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator yield to me to make the point of no quorum? I think Senators should be present when the motion is voted on.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senators from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. O'DANIEL], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] are absent on official business for the Senate.

Mr. MCNARY. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] is absent on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, our distinguished leader the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] was good enough a moment ago to suggest the absence of a quorum in order that I might have the opportunity of explaining to Members who were not then present my individual reason for believing that Senate bill 607, copies of which Senators will find on their desks, should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration.

Mr. President, one has but to read the bill to know why it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. In my opinion the wording of the bill itself implies that the only committee to which it can properly be referred is the Military Affairs Committee. I make that statement for the simple reason that the bill deals with the mobilization of the people of America for an all-out war effort. Let me read a few paragraphs of the bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the purpose of this act to (1) inventory and mobilize all the economic resources of the United States, including manpower, facilities, materials, technical and scientific knowledge, and natural resources—

For what purpose? For one purpose only—

For maximum use in the provision of military and essential civilian needs—

Mr. President, that is the first purpose of the bill. That is its main objective. The second purpose of the bill is what?—

and (2) adjust and stabilize the economy in accordance with the needs of full mobilization and other conditions created—created by war.

By what?—

Created by war, and by war alone.

Let us turn now to page 3, Mr. President, for the purpose of ascertaining the program as outlined by the bill, and what do we find? We find the following language in section 3:

SEC. 3. There is hereby created a Committee on Requirements and Program under the chairmanship of the Director and consisting of the Secretaries of War and the Navy, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Administrators of the four constituent offices of the Office of War Mobilization.

What shall the committee which the bill seeks to create do?

This committee shall develop, subject to the approval of the President, a comprehensive national program for maximum use of resources for military and essential civilian needs.

All those needs were created by one thing only, and that is by war itself.

This program shall be based on schedules—

Of what?—

Schedules of military requirements—

Furnished by whom?—

Furnished by the War and Navy Departments and determinations as to minimum essential civilian needs and available resources by the Office of War Mobilization.

Mr. President, the bill, as I see it, deals fundamentally, first, with the mobilization of the manpower of the Nation, and I contend that without first having the mobilization of the manpower of the Nation we cannot mobilize anything else; and insofar as manpower is concerned, the Committee on Military Affairs has for many months past and is even now today considering the question of mobilization. The committee has had before it innumerable witnesses. I should say we have had before us a minimum of 50 witnesses from the time we began hearings upon the question of manpower early last fall. Those witnesses have included representatives of virtually every branch of the Government.

Only last week there were before us high representatives of the War Department and also of the Navy Department, and of the Maritime Commission, and today we listened to a statement made by Mr. Donald Nelson, of the War Production Board. Tomorrow there will be with us for the second time the Honorable Paul V. McNutt. He will be followed on Monday by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wickard. We have already considered many phases which are involved, I might say, in the objectives of Senate bill 607.

Mr. President, I therefore argue that in my humble opinion the bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, inasmuch as it deals with more war mobilization, a subject in which the Committee on Military Affairs is vitally interested.

Mr. KILGORE obtained the floor.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KILGORE. For what purpose?

Mr. AIKEN. I wish to make a statement which will require approximately 3 minutes.

Mr. KILGORE. I think that what I have to say will not require much more time than that, and I should like to finish my statement before yielding again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I move, to begin with, to amend the motion of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs by striking out the words "the Military Affairs Committee," and inserting the words "the Committee on Education and Labor." I should like to discuss that motion for a moment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. I have no interest in the controversy between the eminent Senators, one of whom wants the bill referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the other to the Committee on Education and Labor; but I am always interested in the observance of the Senate's rules and the parliamentary practice which should be followed.

It is my opinion that a motion of the kind just made by the Senator from West Virginia is not in order. It is not in order to move to substitute one committee for another, but a vote must come directly on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina—namely, reference of the measure to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I suggest my view to the Chair. If my view is the correct one, the procedure which I have suggested would entirely destroy and render unnecessary the motion made by the very eminent senior Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the Senator from Oregon is correct, and sustains the point of order raised.

Mr. KILGORE. Very well, Mr. President. Then I desire to discuss some of the matters raised by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs with reference to his motion.

In the first place, I question whether he realizes the historical background in connection with some of his remarks. There was a time in the history of our Nation when his statement would have been more applicable than it now is. There was a time in the history of our Nation when the War Department handled all matters relating to our armed forces. Gradually we have built up other organizations; and gradually, in order to meet that condition, the Senate has built up other committees, so that now the Senate Committee on Military Affairs deals largely with the Army of the United States and its needs and problems. We have a Naval Affairs Committee, which certainly has some jurisdiction under the bill.

We have a Banking and Currency Committee which, due to its jurisdiction over economic stabilization, certainly has some jurisdiction with reference to a hearing on this bill.

We have a Commerce Committee which, due to its connection with the Maritime Commission, certainly has some jurisdiction with reference to this bill.

We have a Naval Affairs Committee which certainly should have something to say with reference to it.

We also have a Foreign Relations Committee which has jurisdiction over the lease-lend program, which is one of the most important parts of our present program of military expansion. That committee certainly should have some consideration because this bill also deals with lease-lend matters.

The Committee on Education and Labor has to do with measures affecting labor and, inasmuch as manpower has to do with labor, it should have some jurisdiction.

The Agricultural Committee has to do with manpower on the farm and, due to the fact that this bill bears directly on that question in connection with manpower mobilization, certainly that committee should have some jurisdiction.

So we have a bill the jurisdiction of which is divided. There is no over-all wholly appropriate committee in the Senate to consider the measure. For that reason, a motion to refer the bill to the Military Affairs Committee as one of the committees having jurisdiction is perfectly proper.

My position in the matter has been taken in the interest of the economy of time. I feel that the bill should be speedily considered by the appropriate committee to consider it, which is the committee of the whole Senate. My stand has been taken in the interest of getting this bill to the floor at the earliest possible date so that its merits and weaknesses may be discussed, and that the question of the war program may be threshed out with reference to the mobilization of our industry behind the war movement and the mobilization of our agriculture behind it and the economic stabilization behind it.

My effort on last Monday to have this bill referred to the Committee on Education and Labor was due to the fact that it had originally gone to that committee and that the Committee on Education and Labor on that original reference had conducted 10 days' hearings and had heard testimony of 32 witnesses—witnesses such as—

Frederick W. Conant, vice president, Douglas Aircraft;

W. H. Johnstone, assistant to the vice president, Bethlehem Steel;

Harry L. Cannon, president, National Canners' Association;

J. T. Hartson, executive vice president, Glenn L. Martin;

D. W. Siemon, personnel director, Glenn L. Martin;

D. B. Cole, priorities coordinator, Curtiss-Wright Corporation;

Raycroft Walsh, senior vice president, United Aircraft;

H. M. Horner, vice president, Pratt Whitney Aircraft Division;

S. A. Stewart, general manager, Hamilton Standard Propellers;

C. J. McCarthy, general manager, Vought-Sikorsky Aircraft Division;

M. F. Burke, personnel director, United Aircraft;

Ferdinand Eberstadt, Vice Chairman, W. P. B.—250 pages of transcript on Controls of Materials Plan;

Senator Truman;

Senator Kilgore;

Representative Tolan;

Representative Sparkman;

Representative Voorhis;

The top six men of the Tools Division, W. P. B.;

Capt. E. R. Henning;

Lt. Col. V. A. Armstrong, Tools Branch, Army-Navy Munitions Board;

E. D. Spicer, manufacturing vice president, General Electric;

Austin Elmore, production engineer, W. P. B.;

Charles E. Wilson, president, General Motors Corporation;

Charles E. Kettering, General Motors Corporation; and

Mr. Hunt, executive vice president, General Motors Corporation.

Fourteen hundred pages of testimony have already been taken and the subcommittee hearing that testimony is, or should be, ready to report, in fact at the previous session it tendered a report, of which there is a printed copy, I believe, on the desk of each Member of the Senate. I am trying to get the bill in a position in a committee which certainly has some jurisdiction, along with numerous other committees, so that the bill may be brought before the Senate as a whole at an early date. My interest in the matter was purely to get the bill on the floor for discussion.

Certainly there must be some need for discussion of this program. If it were not so, I question whether the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] would have delivered the address he delivered a short time ago with reference to manpower on the farm. Agricultural manpower has become a problem in this country. Shall that question be submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be deprived of any jurisdiction or the opportunity to have any hearing on it? That is a logical "follow through" from the pending motion.

I am a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and I wish it distinctly understood that I am not casting any reflections whatsoever on that committee. It is now carrying on a manpower investigation; but manpower is only a part of this bill. This is an over-all bill designed to coordinate the war effort, not to reorganize, not to disorganize, but to coordinate it. The bill provides a method whereby the manpower problem may be threshed out with representatives of the departments involved and interested in having something to say in an executive way, and not threshed out in the newspapers by controversies in the press between the heads of various departments of the Government, not threshed out on the floors of Congress, and not occasioning four concurrent investigations to be carried on by legislative committees of the Senate in addition to an investigation which has previously been conducted by a special committee of the Senate on just one problem, that problem being manpower alone.

Certainly the questions involved should be brought up and discussed; certainly we should have some opportunity to get the bill on the floor speedily, and either make it workable and pass it or say we are wholly satisfied with the present condition; we want no reorganization; we want no change, no coordination.

For instance, there is certainly need for some coordination or the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] would not have had to carry on the extensive investigation as to the use of alcohol for rubber and why certain patents were not being used. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] some time ago was right about the farm-labor shortage and the farm structure. All that must be geared into the number of men taken for war. There is no need of putting a uniform on a man and taking him out of labor and putting him in a camp and having him stay there indefinitely. If he is put in uniform, he must be of use to the armed forces.

I should like to have the Members present again read the sections read by the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee without special emphasis on certain phases. Just read them as they stand in the bill before deciding whether the Military Affairs Committee should have jurisdiction, due to the fact that the Secretary of War is the first man mentioned. That fact, of course, was highly accented, but is no reason why the Committee on Military Affairs should be the only committee to consider the bill. Before deciding that all these problems are problems for the Military Affairs Committee and the Military Affairs Committee alone, the Senate should consider that the Secretary of the Navy is also mentioned in the bill, and thus, through him, the Committee on Naval Affairs is involved; that agriculture is likewise involved, as is economic stabilization, which is under the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee. If the Senate should send the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, I think we should change the name and call it a committee on the "total over-all conduct of the Nation in time of war."

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield for that purpose?

Mr. KILGORE. No; I shall not yield; I desire to finish my statement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question or would he prefer not to be interrupted?

Mr. KILGORE. I should prefer not to be interrupted until I can get through with this phase of my statement.

We are now engaged, for instance, in north Africa in an offensive effort, and there everything must balance. A soldier over there without supplies is a dead soldier, and the tonnage in carrying him over has been wasted. Is it right that one department and one department alone and one committee and one committee alone should consider this bill, and delay the opportunity to bring it speedily to the floor of the Senate?

So I contend that the argument which was recently made is without the firm foundation on which it is alleged to have been placed. There is no single committee of the Senate that has this over-all jurisdiction. Many of them have partial jurisdiction, but none of them has over-all jurisdiction. The Senate, as a whole, would be the only body at present that could really have a reference of this bill.

It is my purpose—and I am not a member of the Committee on Education and Labor—to get this bill before the Senate as speedily as possible, and not to have it brought out months and months later, when it could do no good.

As evidenced by the newspapers, I believe the people of this country—businessmen, farmers, and all others—are urging a simple decentralized administration of the war effort and an opportunity to be heard without the delay incident to investigation and without controversies in the press, which we must admit cause disunity.

Mr. President, that alone impelled me to make this statement. It is intended as no reflection on the Committee on Military Affairs, as I trust the distinguished chairman of that committee will understand. Why should the Committee on Military Affairs occupy 2 or 3 or 4 months of its time, taking the same 1,400 pages of testimony and possibly some additional testimony, when, within a very few days, the committee to which the bill was originally referred when it was introduced in the last session, and which would have reported the bill to the floor of the Senate had the session lasted a few days longer, can take the bill, pass upon the evidence with the same membership, bring out a report on the bill and decide whether or not the bill should be submitted to the Senate, or whether it should be reported with a recommendation that it pass or what amendment should be made, and then let the Senate, as a whole, have the opportunity to pass on the question.

CONSOLIDATIONS AND MERGERS OF DOMESTIC TELEGRAPH CARRIERS

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senate approved the bill providing for a merger between the Western Union Telegraph Co. and the Postal Telegraph Co. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and I sought, rather unsuccessfully, to secure some information regarding the financial structure of the Postal Telegraph Co., and as that information did not appear to be available, I voted against the bill. Since the passage of the bill, I have secured from official Government agencies the information which I sought. This information is such that, had I possessed it at the time the vote was taken, I would still have opposed the passage of the bill.

It appears to me that such legislation would establish an unwise and wholly unusual precedent, in that a certain few Wall Street brokers and their clients would be the principal beneficiaries and would be assisted in securing some rather unusual profits on their investments.

Since the agitation for the merger of the two telegraph corporations started, there has been a constant and a rather active trading in stock in what is generally considered to be an insolvent corporation. To bear out this assertion, I ask leave to have inserted at this point in my remarks a list of the principal stockholders of the Postal Telegraph Co., as taken from the 1940 report furnished by the Securities and Exchange Commission; a list of the principal stockholders as of December 31, 1941, and a list of the principal stockholders as of May 9, 1942.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the lists were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. AIKEN. It will be observed that the principal stockholders are virtually all New York City brokers and their clients.

Although it was stated on the floor at the time the Senate passed the bill that the effect of its enactment would be to bail out the stockholders, yet, so far as I can see, the legislation would not necessarily result in all the original stockholders recovering what they lost, but rather would have the effect of rewarding speculators who have more recently acquired the stock at comparatively low cost.

It is significant that one Wall Street brokerage house and its clients are listed as holding 40,325 shares of Postal Telegraph stock on December 31, 1941, while as of May 9, 1942, 5 months later, according to the latest figures available, the Federal Communications Commission reports the same brokerage house and its clients as holding 121,656 shares of stock. It appears to me that this comes within the category of speculation rather than of investment.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Will the Senator give for the RECORD the name of that New York brokerage house?

Mr. AIKEN. It will appear in the list of the principal stockholders. The Senator can see for himself how holdings of this particular brokerage concern increased from one period to the other. That is why I have asked leave to have the lists printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TOBEY. Very well.

Mr. AIKEN. It appears to me also that this speculation was prompted by the assumption that Congress would enact legislation permitting this merger. It is worthy of note that the value of the preferred stock, which is reported to have been as low as 9½ during 1942, has constantly risen, being quoted on January 23 of this year at 18⅞, and yesterday, 10 days after the passage of the bill, it closed at 19½.

I ask further leave to have inserted at this point a list of officers and directors of the Postal Telegraph Co., Inc., for the year 1940, as furnished by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS OF POSTAL TELEGRAPH, INC., 1940

Harris Berlack, 1 Wall Street, New York City; Curtis E. Calder, 2 Rector Street, New York City; Edwin F. Chinlund, 253 Broadway, New York City; William H. Coverdale, 120 Wall Street, New York City; Gerhard M. Dahl, 20 Pine Street, New York City; William J. Deegan, 253 Broadway, New York City; Frederick J. Fisher, Fisher Building, Detroit, Mich.; George S. Gibbs, 253 Broadway, New York City; Thomas Hitchcock, Jr., 1 William Street, New York City; Raymond C. Kramer, 1275 Broadway, New York City; James M. Landis, Harvard Law School, Cambridge, Mass.; Harold F. Linder, 61 Broadway, New York City; Sidney Maestre, Mississippi Valley Trust Co., St. Louis, Mo.; Hamilton Pell, 40 Wall Street, New York City; William Rosenblatt, 80 Broad Street, New York City; Cecil P. Stewart, 67 Wall Street, New York City; Ellery W. Stone, 253 Broadway, New York City; Harold E. Talbott, 405 Lexington Avenue, New York City; Paul E. Manheim, 1 William Street, New York City.

OFFICERS NOT DIRECTORS (ALL ADDRESSES ARE 253 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY)

John J. Lynch, Clinton B. Allsopp, John T. Logue, Walter P. Marshall, James C. Phelps.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, it will be noted that all the officers and directors of this corporation, with the exception of three, namely, Frederick J. Fisher, of Detroit; Sidney Maestre, of St. Louis; and the Honorable James M. Landis, of Harvard Law School, now Director of the Office of Civilian Defense, are located in or near Wall Street.

Mr. President, I do not believe it is good policy to enact special legislation to bail out the stockholders of this company, some of whom at least must be classed as speculators in this matter. If it is good business to enact legislation especially designed to cover the losses of profits to these people, why should we not do the same for home owners who have lost their homes through inability to keep up payments, or farmers who have lost their farms because of crop failure or animal diseases? I believe that some Members of the Senate might have voted differently on this measure had they had a full knowledge of the facts at the time the bill was approved. It is also possible that some Members of the Senate may have been influenced to favor the proposed legislation because it was sugar coated with a provision requiring the authorized monopoly to find jobs for all the employees of the insolvent company, or to guarantee their present rate of compensation for a period of 5 years.

I have a great deal of information on this matter which has been furnished me by Government agencies, particularly the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Communications Commission. I shall gladly make any of this information available to any Member of the Congress. In fact, I should like to insert at this point the history of the case as given by the Federal Communications Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM RE POSTAL TELEGRAPH, INC.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
February 1, 1943.

Postal Telegraph, Inc., was incorporated September 20, 1939, under the laws of the State of Delaware, for the purpose of acquiring certain securities owned by the Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation (debtor) and its subsidiary, The Associated Cos. (debtor).

These securities were acquired as of January 31, 1940, pursuant to an order of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York in a proceeding under section 77–B of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended, under which Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation filed, on June 14, 1935, a voluntary petition for reorganization, and under which, on June 21, 1938, The Associated Cos., a subsidiary of the Postal Corporation, filed similar voluntary petitions.

Prior to reorganization, the 35 operating companies constituting the Postal Land Line System, were controlled 100 percent by The Associated Cos., and The Associated Cos. in turn was controlled 91.4 percent by Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation. The latter corporation was controlled 100 percent by the International Telephone & Telegraph Corporation.

In the reorganization of Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation, approved on January 31, 1940, the Postal land line companies were divorced from the International Telephone & Telegraph Corporation, but as a part of the reorganization the land line companies executed contracts for exchange of traffic, etc., with the operating companies in the International Telephone & Telegraph group. Under the plan 4 new corporations were formed. This discussion relates to Postal Telegraph, Inc., which was formed to acquire the capital stock of The Associated Cos., the Postal Telegraph Sales Corporation, and the 35 separate telegraph companies that at that time comprised the Postal Land Line System.

Postal Telegraph, Inc., issued 256,769.9 shares of 4 percent noncumulative preferred stock without par value (entitled in liquidation to $60 per share), with a stated value of $10 per share, and 1,027,079.6 shares of common stock with a par value of $1 per share, all of which is now outstanding. A list of the common stockholders that held 2,000 shares or more, and of the preferred stockholders that held 500 shares or more, as at May 9, 1942, is attached. The company has negotiated loans with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and with the Bankers Trust Co., all of which are now outstanding. The outstanding securities of the Postal Telegraph, Inc., as of October 31, 1942 (except for the notes payable to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which are shown as of this most recent date, January 28, 1943), were as follows:

CAPITAL STOCK

Noncumulative 4-percent preferred stock, authorized 256,770 shares without par value (entitled in liquidation to $60 per share), issued and outstanding 256,769.9 shares, stated value $10 per share, $2,567,699.

Common stock, authorized 1,250,000 shares with a par value of $1 per share, issued and outstanding 1,027,079.6 shares, par value, $1,027,079.60.

NOTES PAYABLE

To Reconstruction Finance Corporation, for loans made from April 24, 1940, to January 28, 1943, $9,000,000.

To Bankers Trust Co., for loan made on February 5, 1940 (secured by certificates of deposit in various depositories and not subject to withdrawal), $1,200,000.

The current liabilities as of October 31, 1942, for unpaid money orders, unpaid wages, traffic balances, taxes, interest, etc., aggregated $4,120,648, as compared with current assets consisting of cash, materials, and supplies, accounts receivable, etc., totaling $7,121,354.

The company has established on its books a reserve for employees' benefits and pensions, but, as an offset to this liability, there has been no fund established or any other segregation of assets. The reserve requirement was determined by actuarial computations and is stated in the amount of $7,298,424 as of October 31, 1942, of which the sum of approximately $3,500,000 represents the present worth of future payments to be made to employees who have become eligible for retirement and are now on the pension rolls. For the first 10 months of 1942 the payments for employees' benefits and pensions amounted to $465,673. The Postal Telegraph, Inc. is also liable as guarantor for subsidiary companies on surety bonds aggregating $160,000.

The Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation (debtor) had outstanding at the date of reorganization, January 31, 1940, the following securities:

CAPITAL STOCK

Common stock without per value, 1,017,650 shares, stated value $25,441,250.

Preferred stock, 305,295 shares, par value $30,529,500.

LONG-TERM DEBT

Twenty-five year collateral trust 5-percent gold bonds, dated July 1, 1928, par value $44,630,500.

Twenty-five year collateral trust 5-percent debenture stock, dated July 1, 1928, par value $6,039,680.

Under the plan of reorganization the holders of the bonds and debenture stock of Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation were entitled to receive, for each $1,000 principal amount of bonds or £206 principal amount of debenture stock, the following:

1. Thirty-five dollars in cash.

2. Five shares of noncumulative preferred stock and 20 shares of common stock of Postal Telegraph, Inc.

3. One hundred and sixty dollars principal amount of Commercial Mackay Corporation income debentures (or scrip therefor), with attached warrants to purchase common stock of American Cable & Radio Corporation at the rate of 115 shares for each $1,000 of income debentures of Commercial Mackay Corporation;

4. Twenty dollars principal amount of All America Corporation income debentures, series B (or scrip therefor); and

5. Twenty shares of common stock of American Cable & Radio Corporation.

The holders of the 6,838 preferred shares of the associated companies outstanding in the hands of the public were entitled to receive, under the plan of reorganization, for each such share of the associated companies one-half share of the noncumulative preferred stock and 2 shares of the common stock of Postal Telegraph, Inc.

No provision was made in the plan of reorganization for the holders of the preferred or the common stock of Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation or the common shares of the associated companies because the court found that Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation was insolvent and the holders of the common shares of the associated companies had no equity in the assets of the associated companies.

The plan of reorganization of Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation was sponsored by Messrs. Robert Lehman, Walter H. Bennett, Harris Berlack, Charles V. Howard, Charles G. Meyer, Edwin L. Weisl, and Frazar B. Wilde as the protective committee for the Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation 25-year, collateral-trust, 5-percent gold bonds due July 1, 1953, and 25-year, collateral-trust, 5-percent debenture stock due July 1, 1953, and by Messrs. Cecil P. Stewart, Milton W. Harrison, Hamilton Pell, and William Rosenblatt as the bondholders committee for the Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation 25-year, collateral-trust, 5-percent gold bonds due July 1, 1953, and 25-year, collateral-trust, 5-percent debenture stock due July 1, 1953. On December 24, 1935, the Honorable Alfred E. Smith and Mr. George S. Gibbs were appointed temporary trustees of Postal, which appointment was made permanent by court order dated January 27, 1936. By order of the court dated September 8, 1937, Mr. Raymond C. Kramer was appointed a cotrustee, the appointment being made permanent October 5, 1937. On January 10, 1938, the resignation of the Honorable Alfred E. Smith as trustee was accepted as of December 31, 1937.

Under the provisions of the order of the court directing the consummation of the plan of reorganization of the Postal Telegraph & Cable Corporation (debtor) and the associated companies (debtor) a special cash fund for reorganization expenses of $650,000 was allowed, of which the sum of $15,901.30 had been expended on January 31, 1940. This fund was placed with Postal Telegraph, Inc., and expenditures from the fund to January 30, 1943, amounted to $621,352. There is at present the sum of $28,648 remaining in this special fund for reorganization expenses.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. I merely wish to make the observation that had the information the Senator is now giving the Senate been given prior to the final vote on the measure, I should have voted differently from the way I did vote.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Oregon for his statement.

I do not wish to take more time this afternoon, when we have other matters before us, but I do wish to reiterate that in my opinion approval of the proposed legislation was unwise and established an unsound precedent. If we are to bail out Wall Street speculators, then there is no reason in the world why we should not bail out other unfortunate investors, particularly the poor people of our country who have sustained losses through no fault of their own. Such a general policy, however, would be unwise, and, in the long run, unworkable. Such legislation does not make for a sounder government.

OFFICE OF WAR MOBILIZATION—REFERENCE OF BILL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 607) to establish an Office of War Mobilization, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PEPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. MAYBANK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

|---|---|---|
| Aiken | George | Overton |
| Andrews | Gerry | Pepper |
| Austin | Gillette | Radcliffe |
| Ball | Gurney | Reed |
| Bankhead | Hawkes | Reynolds |

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PEPPER. Am I correct in assuming that the question before the Senate is the motion that Senate bill 607 be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question before the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Another parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PEPPER. Is a substitute motion parliamentarily possible? For example, a motion that the bill be referred to a combination of two or more committees which have jurisdiction of the subjects thereof, since there are several subjects included in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such a motion would not be in order. Under the rules of the Senate a motion to refer a bill to a committee is not amendable by the substitution of another committee.

Mr. PEPPER. A third parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PEPPER. Then, in view of the present parliamentary situation, it is not possible for the Senate to determine anything except whether the bill shall be referred to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state his question again?

Mr. PEPPER. Then, if I understand correctly the advice of the Chair, the only thing the Senate can do, now that the motion has been made that the bill be referred to the Senate Military Affairs Committee, is either to agree or disagree to the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. That is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah for that purpose?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Utah for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state the inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, according to the ruling made by the Chair, I assume, then, that if the motion is not agreed to the bill will automatically go to the Committee on Education and Labor? Or will it be referred to some other committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The Chair will state that if the motion does not prevail the bill will remain on the table until the Senate makes some reference of it.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. And then the bill will be referred regularly by the Vice President to some committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Vice President has stated that he would submit this question to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Then there will have to be positive, affirmative action following failure of the motion to prevail, if it shall fail to prevail?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, there will have to be positive, affirmative action as to reference of the bill. If the pending motion is defeated a motion to refer to another committee would then be in order.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wanted the parliamentary situation to be clear before I began the discussion of the motion.

I wish to make it very clear to the Senate that if the bill were for the first time coming to the Senate and this motion were made I would certainly have no objection to the motion, even if I did not concur in it. But the bill is not coming to the Senate floor for the first time. A similar bill, with a few immaterial variations, was introduced in the last session of the Congress in the Senate by the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] and the junior Senator from Florida. Upon the motion of the able Senator from West Virginia, and with the concurrence of the Senate, the bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. The able chairman of that committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], appointed a subcommittee to consider that bill and to hold hearings thereon. That subcommittee consisted of the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], former Senator Schwartz of Wyoming, the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], and the junior Senator from Florida, who had the honor to be named chairman of that subcommittee.

We decided that we would begin as much as we could to put into practice here in the Senate some of the counsel we had been giving to the administrative agencies—namely, better to coordinate their efforts and activities than had been done in the past. Accordingly the subcommittee entered into consultation with the Tolan committee in the House of Representatives, which for some 2½ years has been investigating the subject of defense migration and various evolutions of that subject, which finally, in the logical circumstances, brought that committee to the consideration of the most efficient plan of war production for our country. The Tolan committee allowed the Senate Committee on Education and Labor the use of some of the members of its staff, without any cost to the Senate. I may say that the Senate Committee on Education and Labor never had a dime of money with which to employ a staff; only the expenses of the stenographer were incurred by the committee.

Our committee consulted the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] personally cooperated in every way he could in avoiding duplication of testimony in the hearings before the committee, and in bringing to the attention of the subcommittee, as far as he could, the knowledge which his committee had obtained on the general subject of civilian war production.

The Senator from Missouri participated in the first press conference which was held. Thereafter, and during the whole course of the deliberations of the subcommittee, the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] was a participant in the investigation, acting in two capacities; first, as chairman of the Special Committee on Manpower and of the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program, and second, as chairman of the subcommittee on technological mobilization of the Military Affairs Committee. A bill with respect to technological mobilization which had been introduced by the able Senator from West Virginia, was pending before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, and he had been appointed by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee to be chairman of the subcommittee dealing with the subject of technological mobilization.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], chairman of the Small Business Committee, sent from his home authority to be included at the press conference when this bill was first discussed with the press after its introduction. The Senator himself, as well as the members of his staff, gave all the cooperation they could give to the subcommittee in the consideration of this question.

The coordination of these five committees was so effective that every time there was reference in the press to this investigation it was spoken of as the five-committee investigation on the subject of civilian war production. We have brought together, in a fine spirit of coordination and cooperation, the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, whose jurisdiction related primarily to manpower and production, as well as to vocational training; the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program; the Murray Committee on Small Business; the Manpower Subcommittee of the Truman committee; the technological mobilization subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee; and one committee of the House of Representatives, the Tolan committee.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. How many committees are investigating the manpower situation?

Mr. PEPPER. As I was saying, only one committee was conducting the investigation, but the committees which had kindred subjects under consideration collaborated with this committee by having contacts with it, consulting with its members, and making available, so far as possible, to the committee conducting the investigation, such discoveries as they had made.

Mr. LUCAS. It was my understanding the other day, when the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] made a report in which the Truman committee was eliminated from the consideration of the subject of manpower, that he said that at that time some three or four committees were studying the same question. I was occupying the chair at the time and I did not have an opportunity to interrogate the able Senator from West Virginia. I should now like to know whether or not the statement is accurate.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield and then I shall comment on the subject.

Mr. KILGORE. I believe that the question which was asked was misunderstood by the able Senator from Florida. He was discussing the committees which had collaborated on the subject. The announcement was made by me that in view of the fact that four legislative committees of the Senate, namely, the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on Education and Labor, were conducting hearings on the subject of manpower, the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program would suspend further hearings on the subject and make all the evidence which it had available to those four committees, or any other committee desiring to have it.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

In view of the statement which has now been made may I make one observation in the time of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. As a result of the colloquy between the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Florida and myself with respect to the various committees studying the manpower question, I desire to make this observation:

Obviously, somebody ought to study the manpower question, and it ought to be studied with complete thoroughness. Every phase of the subject should be gone into by some committee of the Senate. However, it certainly seems most ridiculous and absurd for four different committees of the Senate to be studying the same question.

Mr. President, I do not believe the question is large enough to warrant four committees studying it, and I doubt if the proper results will be obtained by having four or five Senate committees, and one or more committees in the House, carrying on simultaneous investigations on this important question. I do not believe it would contribute to the war effort to require men like Mr. Paul McNutt and other responsible agents in the Government to be constantly in attendance before committees, spending hour after hour and day after day of their valuable time in consultation with the committees. That is exactly what must happen if each of these committees expects to conduct a proper investigation and examination into the subject. The men at the head of the various governmental agencies must appear before each committee to give testimony with respect to this very important problem.

Frequently Senators, in discussing on the floor of the Senate what is going on in the various departments at the other end of the Avenue, criticize and condemn the duplication of effort and division of authority which exist in various agencies of the Government which are promoting the war effort. Such criticism is proper. Senators are not amiss in their castigation and condemnation of various agencies when they try to find some central authority which has the power to initiate a program and carry it through with effectiveness and efficiency in order to carry on the war and bring it to a close as soon as possible.

Mr. President, in the humble opinion of the Senator from Illinois, it does not behoove us to indulge in much condemnation and criticism if we have four or five committees in the Senate investigating this very question. I say, with all the seriousness that I possess, that four or five committees taking busy men away from their work would hamper the war effort instead of aiding it. I do not care which committee does the work, but one committee ought to do it. We ought not to have several committees continuing to harass these men, bringing them here from their various departments day after day and consuming valuable time when it is so necessary for them to get along with the work which they have to do.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I desire to make something clear to the Senator from Illinois. In the discussion which took place last Tuesday the Senator from West Virginia mentioned the committees which collaborated, and merely suggested that the chairmen of the respective committees, instead of summoning the officials to whom reference has been made for hearing, could have available the testimony which had been amassed over a long period of time in the various committees. The testimony could be placed in the record to save the time we are all trying to save. I believe that that effort to save time and avoid duplication is most laudible.

I am heartily in sympathy with the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I very heartily and distinctly concur in everything the Senator from Illinois has said. That was the point to which I was coming. I was endeavoring to point out that this committee has done just as he has suggested. The so-called war mobilization bill has a great many subjects in it. It affects the Military Affairs Committee and several other committees. In the last session the bill had been actually referred by the Senate—and I did not have anything to do with that reference—to the Committee on Education and Labor. A subcommittee had been appointed to consider the bill. As chairman of the subcommittee, I tried to do what the Senator from Illinois pointed out, namely, to avoid duplication of anything that any other committee had done. We did not call Mr. McNutt or Mr. Donald Nelson. I do not think we duplicated the testimony of any witness. We called Mr. Ferdinand Eberstadt. I do not recall that he was before any other Senate committee. He may have been before the Truman committee, but I doubt it. I doubt if a case of duplication of testimony of any witness can be found in that hearing.

On the contrary, the Tolan committee came in and submitted its record. Mr. TOLAN, chairman of the Tolan committee of the House, frequently sat in at the hearings and tried to be of assistance. Mr. SPARKMAN, of Alabama, a member of the Tolan committee, personally testified, giving us a summary of what the Tolan committee had done.

The chief of staff of the Tolan committee, Dr. Lamb, one of the ablest staff chiefs on Capitol Hill, gave the subcommittee a summary of the record of what the Tolan committee had done in more than 2 years of its investigation throughout the length and breadth of the country.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] personally appeared before the committee and summarized the results of the Truman committee's investigation of the subjects covered by the bill. Staff members of the Truman committee appeared and presented summaries and suggestions from their experience, which were helpful to the subcommittee. The same thing is true of the Small Business Committee, headed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY]. We thought we had done a pretty fair job in coordinating the committees having an interest in the subject, and in endeavoring to avoid duplication of effort.

Mr. President, we proceeded with the investigation for 10 actual hearing days. We heard a total of 32 witnesses. We took 1,400 pages of testimony. These are the prominent witnesses who appeared at our hearings:

Frederick W. Conant, vice president of the Douglas Aircraft Co.; W. H. Johnstone, assistant to the vice president, Bethlehem Steel Corporation; Harry L. Cannon, president of the National Canners Association; J. T. Hartson, executive vice president of the Glenn L. Martin Co.; D. W. Siemon, personnel director of the Glenn L. Martin Co.; D. B. Cole, priorities coordinator of the Curtiss Wright Corporation; Raycroft Walsh, senior vice president of the United Aircraft Co.; H. M. Horner, vice president of Pratt & Whitney aircraft division; S. A. Stewart, general manager of Hamilton Standard Propellers; C. J. McCarthy, general manager of the Vought-Sikorsky aircraft division; M. F. Burke, personnel director of the United Aircraft Co.; and Ferdinand Eberstadt, Vice Chairman of the War Production Board, and in charge of the critical materials control plan. As I say, I do not know of any other committee which has called Mr. Eberstadt.

There also appeared at the hearing before the subcommittee the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], Representatives TOLAN, SPARKMAN, and VOORHIS of California; representatives of the Tools Division of the War Production Board; Capt. E. R. Henning; Lt. Col. V. A. Armstrong, of the Tools Branch, Army-Navy Munitions Board; E. D. Spicer, manufacturing vice president of the General Electric Co.; Austin Elmore, production engineer of the War Production Board; Charles E. Wilson, president of General Motors Corporation; Charles E. Kettering, vice president of General Motors Corporation; and Mr. Hunt, executive vice president of General Motors Corporation.

It will be noted, Mr. President, that we did not go to the department heads and ask the men who were representing the Government what their policies were. We got men from the field. We called witnesses from out in the country to tell us how the Federal program was functioning, whether adequately or deficiently. We did not take the time of any official of the Government. Not once did Mr. Nelson or any of the other top men in the governmental agencies working on the program come before us.

During the same period of time when the subcommittee was considering the bill—Senate bill 2871, as it was then, the bill for the creation of a war mobilization board—we were investigating, at the instance of the committee itself, the question of manpower, particularly with reference to the shortage of doctors in the civilian population of the country. Obviously the subject of manpower runs into many ramifications, and consequently we touched the perimeter of certain other subjects. Witnesses who appeared and discussed the subject of manpower and commented upon the subject of the war mobilization board were numerous, including the heads of the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and the railway brotherhoods. All of them appeared, and numerous other witnesses likewise appeared. Those witnesses commented upon the general subject of the efficient use of the nation's facilities and manpower resources.

Mr. President, the committee concluded the hearings which were possible to be had before the holidays, and made a report to the full Committee on Education and Labor. The report of the subcommittee is printed, and I ask that the pages distribute copies of the report to the desks of all Senators, so that they may ascertain whether or not an honest and possibly a capable effort was made by the subcommittee to discharge its obligation to the Senate, whose agent it was, in the consideration of this subject. The printed report embraces 14½ pages. Since I had only a small part in the preparation of the report, I am presumptuous enough to believe that it will not be ridiculed or belittled by anyone who will give the subcommittee the courtesy of reading it.

The subcommittee tried to make an analysis of our civilian production problems. It was not out to "get" anyone. It did not disparage or discourage anyone, either personally or as an agency. We did not have any ax to grind. However, Mr. President, we were vitally aware of what civilian production means not only to the eventual determination of the issue, but to the length of time required to reach the end of the war. If there is division in responsibility among the administrative agencies, if there is inefficiency in their program, if there is lack of necessary authority, if there is too much evading and equivocation on the part of the agencies affected, if there is no head to the war effort save in the person of the President of the United States, the committee ventured to think that it is time for the Congress to go into the matter seriously.

Mr. President, the bill is called the war mobilization bill. Perhaps as good a way as any for me to indicate to the Senate the nature of the bill is to say that its first and primary object is to provide a head for the civilian war effort of the Nation during this war; and that head, according to the provisions of the bill, would be the Director of the War Mobilization Board for which the bill provides. The Director would preside over two bodies.

One would be the War Mobilization Board itself, which we might say would have, by the provisions of the bill, the primary responsibility and power to get the maximum war production out of the Nation's facilities for production. Who would constitute the War Mobilization Board? It would be composed—to read from the bill itself—of 16 persons; 4 representatives of industry, 4 representatives of labor, 4 representatives of agriculture, and 4 public members at large, all to be appointed by the Director, with the advice and approval of the President.

Let me say that the Director himself is to be appointed by the President, not subject to confirmation by the Senate, and under the terms of the bill would be given a fixed salary, and would be required to give his full time to his duties, and to separate himself meanwhile from any private interest. We took away the power of confirmation by the Senate, in order to give the President the greatest possible flexibility in the administration of the program and the selection of the responsible personnel.

Mr. President, the War Mobilization Board, as I have said, is to be presided over by a director called the Director of War Mobilization, to whom I have just referred.

Another important adjunct of the organization is a committee on requirements and program, under the chairmanship of the director of the War Mobilization Board, and to consist of the following: The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the administrators of the four constituent offices of the Office of War Mobilization.

Imagine, if you will, therefore, the War Mobilization Board itself composed of 16 persons representing, respectively, industry, labor, agriculture, and the public, and then on the same plane with the War Mobilization Board itself a committee on Requirements and Program, consisting of the officers whom I have just named. That is what we might call the general staff of the War Mobilization Board.

Underneath the War Mobilization Board is to be set up the administrative, operating organization, which would consist of four pillars, Mr. President. One of those would be concerned with war production and supply or procurement, not merely for the Army, not merely for the Navy, not merely for the Maritime Commission, not merely for the Office of Lend-Lease, not merely for agriculture, but for the United States of America, one nation indivisible, waging war indivisibly. So imagine as the first pillar under the Office of War Mobilization, the Office of Production and Supply.

The next pillar, and essentially a vital one, would be the Office of Manpower Supply, in charge of manpower—not merely for the War Department or the Navy Department or some other branch of the Government, but for the Government of the United States waging and making war.

The third pillar would be the Office of Scientific and Technical Mobilization. As I said, provision for it was incorporated into the bill primarily because it is essential to efficient and effective war production that there be coordination of all the research of the country in order that it will be available to all the agencies of the Government engaged in production, so that it will be the instrument of the Nation and not merely of a particular company or of a particular division of the War Production Board or of the armed services.

The fourth pillar would be the Office of Economic Stabilization—the one which would have the responsibility for economic stabilization in the Nation—not merely for a part, not merely for only one class, not with respect to only one group, but economic stabilization in the United States of America.

So at the top we should have the Director of the Office of War Mobilization; and under the Director, and presided over by him, would be the Board of War Mobilization. Let me say that we did not believe in committees; we are trying to get away from committees, so that someone can decide something sometime; and, Mr.President,let me say that with respect to the matter of committees I suspect that I share the sentiment entertained by most, if not all, Members of the Senate. I have seen so much frustration by committees that I wondered whether I should prefer to go to heaven if my going there had to depend upon the eventual decision of a committee, if it would be like some of the United States Government coordinating committees located in Washington. I thought that I might as well go on to the other place, because that is usually where a project eventually goes if it has to run the gamut of committees, without anyone being the head of any one of the committees and responsible for its doing a job.

Mr. President, I digress here to mention two things which come to my mind in that respect. One of them was what a wag said during the impeachment proceedings against Lord Hastings.

That case rocked on for 7 years, I believe. The very able attorney who later came to be Lord Eldon, and who then was attorney for Warren Hastings, had the following practice: Every time a critical point came up he would make objection to the introduction of the testimony; and the House of Lords would rise solemnly from their seats, would solemnly parade out the doors to their secret chamber, would solemnly deliberate and debate upon the point made by the defense counsel, thereafter would solemnly arise, would solemnly walk back into the chamber, would solemnly sit down again, and would solemnly announce their eventual decision.

After, as I say, the case had gone on for 7 years, and had not concluded, it was said, "The court moves that the case stand still." Or I might refer, Mr. President, to what was said to have been the provision of a statute in one of the pioneer States of the early days which is supposed to have read, "When two trains shall meet neither shall proceed until the other has passed."

So I have said, at the top is the Director of the War Mobilization Board; under him is the War Mobilization Board itself, consisting of 16 different men, representing industry, labor, agriculture, and the public. Then, on the same level with the War Mobilization Board, is the Committee on Program and Requirements, consisting of the individuals I named a while ago. Then, under that, are the pillars of the structure, the Office of Production and Supply, the Office of Manpower Supply, the Office of Scientific and Technical Mobilization, and the Office of Economic Stabilization.

But again, Mr. President, we wanted unity somewhere, not just at the top but at the bottom, actually on the ground. Consequently, these four pillars, as it were, converge into a regional office in every region in the country, and we find that in each one of those regions there is not a division of responsibility and separation physically and intellectually in their policies, but we find the four principal operating agencies of the whole structure actually sitting together around the table presided over by a representative of the Chairman of the War Mobilization Board. That means that in a region, for example, there is somebody who can speak with authority, somebody who is chairman of the Board who can call them together, and have them sit around the table, and they know they have all the necessary authority. We would not have the spectacle of a little businessman going somewhere in an effort to get a contract and one agency saying, "We are sorry but it does not come within the scope of our authority," and another saying, "We are sorry but this does not come within the sphere of our duty," until the poor fellow is frustrated in his effort to find somebody who can speak before the Government of the United States acts.

So what we have done in the bill is to provide for a concentration of responsibility and authority, a decentralization of operating authority and power, and such a coordination of power that they can effectively function together, so that if a problem comes up there will be some one there whose duty it will be to deal with the problem.

Mr. President, at the present time it is a sad fact that the very lack of that kind of an organization or something similar to it is prolonging the war, even endangering the issue of the contest, and exacting a tragic toll of the lives of those who must bear the brunt of the prolonged fighting. In other words, discussing the merits of the bill, the American people have become sorely tired of seeing agency after agency here in Washington fighting with one another, having conflicts over whether the octane gas or the escort vessel program or rubber production should get vital and critical materials, with no one able to tell how greatly either program would be affected by a separation of or a division of war materials. In other words, today there is not anywhere in Washington anyone who can tell any Senator if Mr. Jeffers' request for materials to carry on his synthetic rubber program is granted what it will do to the ship program of the Navy and what it will do to the octane gas program, because no one knows what facilities are really being employed in those programs, and the critical materials and the facilities in this country have not been so scheduled as to channel into the various operations. That is the essential deficiency at which this bill is striking.

Senators know what has been the evolution of the civilian war production and the war program. In the days before Congress passed the lease-lend bill the Government had no particular interest or any responsibility for efficiency in American production that went to the Allies. They came here; they negotiated; they bought, and delivery was made according to the law as it then existed. But in the spring of 1941 we passed the Lend-Lease Act, and then the Government of the United States committed itself to a war-production program.

Mr. President, as you know, we had a National Defense Advisory Committee in the first instance; then we had S. P. A. B.; then we had the Office of Production Management; finally, the Office of War Production; and, eventually, the Chairman of the War Production Board, acting pursuant to certain directives that were given by the President. We have never had a legislative organization of the war effort; it has been left solely to the administrative branch of the Government. The program has simply evolved. Many glorious achievements have been realized; but, Mr. President, I remind Senators that it is not what we have done that is important in respect to the Nation's production; it is whether we have done all that we could have done and are doing all we can do.

Every one of us shares immense pride in what we have accomplished; but, Mr. President, our obligation is to do our best and to remove any bottleneck, to supply any deficiency, to provide against any inadequacy that may keep us from doing the very best that this Nation is capable of doing. Yet, in spite of all the evolution that has been going on and all that has been accomplished, nearly every day the newspapers bring illustrations of the necessity for the centralization of war production in the hands of some persons and boards other than in the person of our great President himself.

Mr. President, war production in war is a gigantic, a colossal enterprise. The President cannot be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, exercise his civilian functions as President, and, at the same time, be the effective head to the extent that he would like to be of the war-production program of the country. Of course, he is the final authority in the Army, but he does not administer the details of the Army. When he wants to consult with the Army or give it a directive, he does not call in the Quartermaster Corps; he does not call in the Signal Corps; he does not call in a division of the Army; he calls in the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff, and, under that great organization, are sprawled and stretched the mighty forces of our war organization.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have been very much interested in what the Senator is saying, but as I understand his explanation, his plan really means that we would have two Presidents, would we not?

Mr. PEPPER. No; no more than we have two Presidents or two Chiefs of Naval Operations or two Chiefs of Staff. Mr. President, we should merely have one President to whom these various heads would be answerable; but there would be a sort of general staff for war production and somebody at the head of it answerable to the President.

Mr. TYDINGS. My question was prompted by a realization that if we had a single head and then, under that single head, had the various divisions which the Senator has outlined, and under them, had certain executives who would give the whole program motivation, so to speak, it seems to me that practically all the power, except tactical dispositions of the military and the Navy would be in the hands of a single individual who would be the director of war mobilization.

In other words, he would control economic stabilization, the manpower for agriculture and factory alike, and the material situation for both the war effort and the civilian population; so, outside of levying taxes and directing the tactical employment of the Army and Navy and the Marine Corps, practically all the power—and I am not criticizing it, understand—I am merely listening to the explanation—one man would have virtually all the power which we have given to the President, with the exception perhaps of his right as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and the congressional right to appropriate money. There does not seem to be much else in the picture. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will allow me, I should say the Senator is wrong, for the reason that the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and as the President, has just come back from a great conference in Africa, where he was in consultation with the civil heads of other governments, where the civil heads, the military and naval heads, the supply heads, and so on, were in consultation.

The fact that the President had a Chief of Staff, a very able one, whom we all respect; the fact that the President had a distinguished Chief of Naval Operations; the fact that the President had various very efficient heads of the supply services did not mean that the President himself was not a very busy man, and did not have any obligations to fulfill. In other words, he did not sit in a place of isolation and say, "All I have to do is just to talk to my one man." Being Commander in Chief is a busy job, even when there is a magnificent organization under him, as the President has.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not taking issue with that phase of the matter, but as I listened to the powers which would all stem back to the director, I was trying to ascertain what he would not have the right to do, as well as what he would have the right to do.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I could answer the Senator in several different ways. For example, as I stated awhile ago, the President would have the power to remove the man who was the Director of the War Mobilization Board. Of course, he would be in constant consultation with the Director, just as he is with the Chief of Staff, whom he has the power to remove, or the Chief of Naval Operations. In addition to that, he would have to approve all the different appointees. They, too, could be removed by him.

Mr. TYDINGS. By whom; by the President?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think the Senator has gotten the import of my question. I am not talking about the President; I am talking about the head man of the War Mobilization Board which the Senator would create. It seems to me he would have all the power—and perhaps it would be right to give it to him—possessed by the President under our Constitution, except the right to be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; and, indirectly, to some extent he would have a pretty big voice in that. He would not participate in the power of taxation, and perhaps the power of legislation, in a formal way; but his decision, in the first or second or third or fourth category of the general set-up, would be so all-embracing that he would practically be king, would he not?

Mr. PEPPER. No; he would not be king. He would not be clothed, substantially, with any larger power than the President's directive vested in Donald Nelson. As a matter of fact, if the able Senator will refresh his mind about the Presidential directive to Donald Nelson, he will observe that, except as to the agencies which are not included, for example, those handling economic stabilization and technological mobilization, Donald Nelson substantially has, or was intended by that directive to have, subject to the President's control, practically all power over the mobilization and the operation of our war activities.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think that is a fair statement, and it goes back to my original observation. I am not in disagreement and I am not in agreement; I am merely seeking information.

Mr. PEPPER. I appreciate the Senator's attitude.

Mr. TYDINGS. It seems to me that what the Senator would really do would be to create two Presidents, one our regular, normal President, and under him the Senator would place a man to take the full responsibility of making the myriad decisions in the ramified fields which the Senator has so ably described.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will permit me, I agree, but with the deletion of the idea of "another President."

Mr. TYDINGS. That may be an unfortunate appelation, but I do not mean it in a political sense.

Mr. PEPPER. I understand what the Senator means. Getting at the substance of what the able Senator says, the answer is "Yes."

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. PEPPER. Just as the Chief of Staff has broad powers over the control of the Army, just as the Chief of Naval Operations has broad powers over the Navy. The purpose of the bill, as the Senator correctly analyzes it, is to put in someone besides the busy person of the President the authority to reconcile the various conflicting and claiming agencies, and the authority to keep the whole thing in some sort of coordinated shape.

Mr. TYDINGS. So that if there were any dispute over manpower, over material, over economic stabilization, over technological information, and the four men at the top of the four divisions could not decide the questions or reconcile their differences, they would put any disputed point on the Director's desk, and he would say what was what; and that would be final?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct; except that the President would have the final say.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am greatly impressed with much of what the Senator has said. I do not know that I agree with all he has said, but I think his description of the problem is accurate and fair, and he has a solution for it, which is much more than many others have.

When it is all boiled down—and I do not mean this in any harsh or Nazi sense—the proposal is really to set up an economic dictator for the United States, with power to decide and act?

Mr. PEPPER. There again, we would be setting up a director of the war mobilization effort who would have the power to decide.

Mr. TYDINGS. To decide all these ramified economic questions, whether they touch men, or materials, or what not?

Mr. PEPPER. That is exactly correct. I am very much indebted to the able Senator for his inquiries and his statements.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I have listened with much interest to the distinguished Senator. As I understand, we are discussing the question whether Senate bill 607 shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs or go back to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. I am not a member of either committee. I have listened with much interest to what we might call the report of the Committee on Education and Labor, in which the distinguished Senators have set forth their idea as to what the bill should be. If I understand, the bill now under discussion incorporates that idea?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. In other words, when the last session of the Congress ended, the committee had arrived at a conclusion, which is embodied in this report?

Mr. PEPPER. The subcommittee had.

Mr. WILEY. The subcommittee?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. Had the committee adopted the report?

Mr. PEPPER. It had not, nor had the subcommittee concluded its hearings. It made a kind of an ad interim report.

Mr. WILEY. I assume that if the bill were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, it would agree substantially with the essence of the report which I hold in my hand. I should like to know what the difference is between the idea of the Senator and what the Military Affairs Committee wants.

Mr. PEPPER. The bill was reintroduced upon the convening of this session of Congress, not by merely the two Senators who had previously introduced the bill.

Mr. WILEY. Perhaps I can best put my question in this form: Why does the Senator fear the bill going to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. PEPPER. I will ask the Senator to permit me to finish the other statement. When Congress convened at the beginning of this session, instead of the bill being introduced by just the two Senators who previously introduced it, it was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] for himself, joined by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], nine Senators in all, who joined in the introduction of the bill. I do not presume to say that those Senators have any preference as to the committee to which the bill should go, but we have the incident of this motion being made in the nature of a motion to discharge a committee engaged in the consideration of a bill. I was raising the question whether that was quite fair to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The able Senator might have asked his question the other way—what is it that the able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is afraid of? Even assuming that the Committee on Education and Labor should not have had the bill in the first place, it was given the bill by the Senate, a subcommittee was appointed, the subcommittee went about the investigation, honestly, at least, if not wisely, coordinating its efforts with the work of other committees.

Then they made an ad interim report to the full committee, which the full committee has never had a chance to consider; and the subcommittee had not concluded its hearings. It never had voted to conclude them. I do not know whether any subcommittee might desire to go along further. Then, when the last session terminated, at the holiday season, and the bill was on the calendar, and before the committee expired, no one thought of the subject as one that had been abandoned. While the committee had no technical right to conclude that their jurisdiction would continue, nevertheless the sponsors of the original bill, and the seven additional sponsors of the bill at this session when it was reintroduced, joined in its introduction. I suppose that some might have assumed that the bill would go back to the same committee which had already had jurisdiction of it, and was one of the committees which had a right to consider some of the subjects involved.

One Senator, the able Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], when the reference was about to be made, as I understand, to the Committee on Education and Labor, rose and raised the point that the bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Frankly, there has been quite a bit of skirmishing going on. I am prepared to say that, unless I am incorrectly informed, representatives of the Navy and War Departments have committed the gross indiscretion of trying to influence the action of the Senate as to the committee to which this bill should be referred, and that, I suspect, is a confirmable fact. I do not discredit anyone's motive or disparage anyone's purpose, but it is a serious question as to whether anyone from either the War or the Navy Departments should take any part in deciding the way in which the Senate refers its bills, unless they have a purpose in their effort.

Mr. WILEY. If I were seated in the gallery of the Senate and were not particularly interested in the mechanics of this matter, I should ask the question which I have asked the Senator, namely, What is all the controversy about? In other words, if what the Senator says is accurate, why does the Committee on Military Affairs want the bill, or why does the Senator want the Committee on Education and Labor to keep it? The Senator knows why he wants the latter committee to keep it. In other words, he wants the bill to come out substantially in the form in which it now is.

It seems to me that Members of the Senate, who are not members of either committee, are entitled to know what members of the Military Affairs Committee believe the bill should contain instead of what it does contain. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to add some further comments, but at this time I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Florida introduced Senate bill 2871 in the last session of Congress?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; together with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE].

Mr. CHANDLER. How did it happen that that bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. PEPPER. I understand that a suggestion of reference was made on the floor by the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], if I am correctly informed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then, because of the request of the Senator from West Virginia, the bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. PEPPER. That is my understanding. It was sent to that committee by the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was that bill identical in terms with the bill now under discussion?

Mr. PEPPER. I think one might say that they are substantially the same. The sponsors think there has been some little improvement in the second draft over the first bill, although there has been no great departure in principle in the two bills.

Mr. CHANDLER. That was the basis on which the subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, of which the Senator from Florida was chairman, proceeded to consider the bill and hold hearings on it?

Mr. PEPPER. When the bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor the chairman of the committee appointed a subcommittee, the personnel of which I named a while ago, and that subcommittee, in the manner I have described, began to hold hearings on the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. As I understand, this bill undertakes to create an independent agency, a brand new one, and place at its head a director, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] suggested a moment ago, who would receive $20,000 a year, and who would not be confirmed by the Senate of the United States but would simply be appointed by the President. The new agency would take the place of all the presently constituted agencies of War and Navy, and all agencies which are now undertakiing to make war on behalf of the people of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. No, I would not be at all justified in assenting to what my friend the Senator from Kentucky has said. In the first place, if I understand correctly, Mr. Donald Nelson was not confirmed by the Senate. Neither would the director contemplated to be appointed under this bill be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. He would not be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. CHANDLER. He would be in charge, let us say, of four main divisions.

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. CHANDLER. The heads of those divisions would be under the director?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. CHANDLER. The bill proposes that each of those administrators shall receive $15,000 a year, and then it proposes that deputy administrators be appointed, as many as the Director deems necessary, and each deputy administrator so appointed shall be compensated at the rate of $12,000 a year.

Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Florida this question: If the Senator were the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, or even the President of the United States—and the Senator might be either, or all, that is one at a time, and fill very capably any one of those offices, I might say——

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator from Kentucky for the imaginary compliment.

Mr. CHANDLER. In such event it would be the Senator's business to make war. The President of the United States, so long as he is President of the United States, is the Commander in Chief and the head of the Army and Navy of the United States, and it is his business to make war. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. PEPPER. The War Department——

Mr. CHANDLER. No; I am speaking of the President. It is his business to make war.

Mr. PEPPER. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. Under the Constitution of the United States the Congress declares war, or the necessity for war, or says that we are in a state of war, but the Congress cannot make war. The President of the United States, under the Constitution, is the one who has to make war.

Mr. PEPPER. It depends on what the Senator means by the expression "make war." The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. He is the boss, is he not?

Mr. PEPPER. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. Can he escape making any important decision, even if he should want to? It makes no difference whether he is in Casablanca or on Pennsylvania Avenue—he cannot escape making any important decision, can he?

Mr. PEPPER. I think he could have escaped making many decisions he has made if responsibility for making them had been properly delegated.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; but should he not make the important decisions?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me go further. If the Senator were Secretary of War, or Secretary of the Navy, and a bill was introduced in Congress which would tear up his Department, as the pending bill would do, or take from the Senator, as the head of the Department, the responsibility not only to assist the President in making the war, but to secure materials, and mobilize and train men, and make the war a success, he might feel that such a bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I should think that such a bill should go to the Military Affairs Committee simply as a matter of plain sense. I do not understand why a member of the Military Affairs Committee should want to have the bill sent to the Committee on Education and Labor. One of the Senators who joined in introducing the bill is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PEPPER. Other Senators are also members of both committees.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why is not a bill which proposes virtually to root out the power and authority of the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Procurement Division a matter of concern to Senators who are members of the Military Affairs Committee?

Mr. PEPPER. I should be glad to answer that question.

Mr. CHANDLER. The fact that in another Congress a Senator suggested that a similar bill go to the Committee on Education and Labor does not mean that such a bill should go to that committee now. There was a time when Senators used to have bills referred to committees in which they thought they could get favorable action, and have the bills reported early. I should like to have bills in which I am interested so referred, and the Senator from Florida would also, but the rule with respect to the reference of bills has been changed. When I was a State legislator I tried to have bills in which I was interested referred to committees which would act favorably upon them, and that was done when I could persuade the presiding officer to do so. But here is a bill which a Senator suggests be sent to a committee whose main business is not helping to make war. On the other hand the main business of the Committee on Military Affairs is to help to make war.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the question is a fair one, and I will try to make a fair answer to it. This bill includes the whole subject of war production. It covers naval matters as well as military matters. The chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee could just as well have made the motion as the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I interject at that point to say that the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee wants the bill to go to the Military Affairs Committee. Is that persuasive to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me to answer his question, I will say that I knew that, and I knew that the reason the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee wanted it so referred was that the Navy Department apparently wanted it done.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the question is that of making war and making war successfully, and if we here in Congress could conduct the war I should be in favor of making it here, but I am not going to support a proposal of the sort made by the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has yielded to me, and I should like to finish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky finish, and if he wants to speak in his own time he knows I am one who would like to hear him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want to trespass unduly on the Senator's time.

Mr. PEPPER. I understand that.

Mr. CHANDLER. If I thought the Congress could make war more advantageously than the President of the United States, and the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, and the Chief of Staff, very well. I think, however, that the creation of another agency to usurp the powers of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, the head of which would be as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has said, an assistant to the President of the United States, would simply result in adding chaos to confusion. If the President wants that sort of an assistant he can appoint him. If I thought that the Congress could conduct the war better than the President of the United States can, that would be another thing; but, considering the fact that we are in the war now, and that we have a leader and responsible generals, we should leave the making of the war to them. We will not win the war by changing leaders.

If we cannot win with our present leaders the chances are we will be defeated. We cannot train new leaders now in the midst of the war. I do not want to support any bill which would result in hindering the war. We have a Commander in Chief, and I do not think we can change the Commander in Chief in time of war. We have to fight the war with him in command. At least we cannot change the Commander in Chief for the next couple of years, and if he runs for office at the end of that time I think he will defeat his opponents. Senators, we have a war on, and I think the Commander in Chief will defeat his opponents during the war.

Mr. PEPPER. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator from Kentucky has spoken of the President of the United States, and the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, and he asked whether we thought that these gentlemen would be interested in a bill which would take away their powers or change their powers. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. He knows that the full Senate Committee on Education and Labor has not even considered this bill. Hearings have been held on a similar measure by a subcommittee of that committee. Does the Senator from Kentucky, first of all, think that the Committee on Education and Labor would report a bill affecting the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy without calling upon those gentlemen?

The next question is as to interest. If the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are interested in this bill, does the Senator from Kentucky imply that they are interested to the extent that they would do the discourteous thing of suggesting that the bill be taken away from the Committee on Education and Labor and given to another committee, instead of coming out and testifying why they are opposed to the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky does not imply that anyone would do a discourteous thing. I did not say anything that would imply it. The Senator from Utah is a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and the Senator from Kentucky did not imply that he would not give earnest and careful consideration to any proposal that was of interest to the conduct of the war.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, may I ask further why a motion should be made by the chairman of another committee that the bill be referred to it when that committee has not heretofore considered the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will have to address that question to the Senator who made the motion, the Senator from North Carolina, who is the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Senators who listen to the discussion will find that there is a lack of understanding about certain things. Are the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy suspicious of the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will have to ask them about that. I do not know.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator brought their names into the discussion, Mr. President.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, I said, "assuming that the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy"——

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The names of the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy were brought into the discussion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not bring them in. They were already in the debate.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The question is asked, Would they not be interested in a bill affecting them? Of course, they would be interested in a bill affecting them.

Mr. CHANDLER. I said so.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Would the Senator from Kentucky imply that they would be so discourteous as to suggest that they would not testify before a certain committee?

Mr. CHANDLER. I would not suggest that. I do not believe they are.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. I heard only a portion of the discussion which has just taken place. I should like to clarify the record. I wish to ask whether the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER] infers by his remarks that the purpose of the bill is to demote or kick out a general or all generals, and to change the leaders during the progress of the war. The bill has no such purpose whatever. The use in the RECORD of the words "general" or "generals" might be misconstrued.

Mr. CHANDLER. Obviously the Senator from West Virgina did not hear all of my remarks because there is nothing in them like that.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, as the able chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor has said, the motion made by the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee is in the nature of a motion to discharge one of the standing and major committees of the Senate engaged in the consideration of a bill before that committee has had an opportunity as a full committee to deliberate upon it or make any recommendations.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. The statement made by the able Senator from Florida is in error. The chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor has just said that the bill has not been considered by the committee. It has not been considered because it was introduced only a short time ago.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I said that the motion was made before the subject had been considered by the committee as a whole. The subcommittee which had been considering it had made its report to the full committee, which has not had an opportunity to act.

Mr. CHANDLER. Even the subcommittee has not considered the new bill.

Mr. PEPPER. It has considered a bill which was the parent of the present bill, and substantially the same as the bill now being discussed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Several changes were made.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the Senate has already had an opportunity to see a little behind the scenes in this controversy. Let me put my finger where the flesh is tender and explain just what this is.

The bill would provide that procurement shall be in civilian hands and not in military or naval hands. It would set up a coordinating agency which would have three powers.

The first would be control of the critical materials, which is already vested in the requirements committee of the War Production Board, headed by a very able chairman, Mr. Eberstadt. The second power would be the power to schedule all production. The third power would be over-all production planning. Some of the military men have expressed themselves very strongly to me personally with regard to the struggle which is going on. They do not want the Services of Supply to be headed by a civilian, or to have a civilian vested with the principal procurement power in respect to the production program.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to conclude as soon as I can. I do not wish to yield for debate. The Senator may speak in his own time, but I yield for a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks that a civilian knows what caliber guns or what kind of ammunition the Army needs. I should like to ask him if he does not believe that the Army ought to be the one to say how many guns, and of what caliber, as well as what ships and munitions it needs to fight with. Does the Senator believe that a civilian should make such decisions?

Mr. PEPPER. I believe that the answer to the first question is "Yes." The Army ought to have authority to prescribe specifications and the quantity of the equipment it desires, and should have the right to prescribe its character. It should also have the right to inspect it, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator think the Army ought to be required to debate with civilians as to whether its needs are real or imaginary?

Mr. PEPPER. No.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is what would happen under an arrangement such as this.

Mr. PEPPER. The pending bill does not provide for such an arrangement.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator just said that it would take away those prerogatives from the Army.

Mr. PEPPER. I said that it would take away procurement. If the Senator will be good enough to allow me to complete my remarks I shall try to answer his question.

Mr. President, of course, the armed services should prescribe specifications for their equipment, and should have the power to inspect its production. They should also have the power to specify the material which shall go into the production, and determine the quantity which is needed.

Mr. President, let me ask a question in reply. Does any Senator believe that military and naval men are as well qualified as are the best production men in America to obtain production from factories throughout the country? That is the essential question.

There are two questions. The first involves putting at the head of the program a civilian who is a production man, who knows how to mobilize the production facilities of America. If I were making the decision I should put a civilian, instead of a general or an admiral, in charge of such a program.

Mr. President, the first question is whether or not we want some central head for the whole program. If we answer "yes" to that question I think we will all agree on the necessity for a head for the war production program in order to avoid multiplication and division of authority, conflicts of interest, prostration to a considerable extent in the effort, and potential disaster in the result.

Generally speaking, who is better qualified to be the head, a civilian or a member of one of the armed services? If a member of one of the services is to be appointed, he must be a member of the Navy, the Army, the Marine Corps, the Air Corps, or some other division of the armed forces. Does the Navy want an Army man in charge of its program? Does the Army want a Navy man over its program? Does any of the services want a member of some other service over its program? In the long run, if one man must be in charge, would they not want the best production man in America in charge of the production facilities of America?

Let me give an illustration of the way this thing works out. Sometime ago we saw in the newspapers—and we received repercussions of it—evidence of the fight going on for Mr. Donald Nelson to get back the power which he had delegated to the armed services—power which the President gave him in the first instance, and which he ought never to have delegated. That was the power to schedule, the power to procure, the power to produce.

However, the War Production Board has not been a war production board. It has been an umpire among the claimant agencies for critical material. Donald Nelson has never exercised the power to command the production machinery of America, and to schedule production for the war effort.

A few days ago, while the President was in Casablanca, the rubber-production program was stymied for days while Mr. James Byrnes was endeavoring to reconcile the conflict among those who were claiming valves and turbines essential to the three programs of octane gas, escort ships, and synthetic rubber.

The Navy was afraid of the impairment which might result to its escort-vessel program, and yet no one in the Government could tell how many ships would be delayed, or whether any would necessarily be delayed. No one knew what valves or turbines were to go to what engines. It was like reaching out into the dark. It might be dangerous to run into a dark room, becauses one might hit something. We cannot have a hit-or-miss program and obtain maximum efficiency from the production machinery.

Mr. Nelson received a broad directive from the President. The President expected one man to be the boss—not a dictator, not an assistant king or assistant President, but in time of war the effective, courageous head of the war-production program, just as the Chief of Staff is the head of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations is the head of the Navy, and the President of the United States is the head of the Government and the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Then Mr. Nelson saw the program breaking down and the President's goals not being met. We know that the President wanted more airplanes than he is going to get this year, because there was a bottleneck in aluminum production. All the Army had done was to make contracts with every aluminum company it could find to produce aluminum extrusions. There were not enough. The Army could not help it.

At that stage Mr. Nelson became disturbed because the program was out of balance and not coordinated. He set up a material control program to try to regain control over critical materials, to use the critical materials we had to the best advantage. He put an extraordinarily able man in charge of that program. He saw that was not enough, but that he had to have the power to schedule, to plan, and to procure if he would avoid conflicts and get the best results. That story is not strange to the Senate or to members of Senate committees.

I think it ought to be said that Mr. Nelson, with the collaboration of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Under Secretaries, and with the support of the President, obtained the services of Mr. Charles Wilson and made him Vice Chairman of the War Production Board. On the whole, Mr. Wilson has been doing a magnificent job.

He was given the title of vice chairman of the War Production Board, but actually he was not put in charge of anything except radar and airplane production, going on the theory that with the gradual expansion of his authority it would be found that he was actually in charge of war production.

There is no head of the War Production Board except in respect to radar and airplanes. All the rest of it is divided up among various claimant agencies, and a limited power is vested in the distinguished chairman of the War Production Board.

When Mr. Wilson took that job he began to look around and see what was going on. He found a deficiency of aluminum extrusions. He did not stop merely because all the aluminum factories were choked up with contracts for the armed services. He looked for facilities. He found that some of the copper processing facilities were not fully employed in war production in processing raw copper, so he changed those machines over so that they would make aluminum extrusions. In a little while the deficiencies began to disappear, the airplane program was accelerated, and American boys began to have something to fight with.

I could give a dozen illustrations. Mr. Wilson saw, before he ever got here, that this conflict would occur among the claimants of facilities for the production of octane gas, synthetic rubber, and escort vessels, because they all called on the same facilities engaged in the production of valves and turbines, and there was not enough to go around. No one had anticipated that to make so many ships, so much synthetic rubber, or so much octane gas would require so many machines making valves and so many machines making turbines. Government officials said, "We will make so many ships, so many airplanes, and so much octane gas," without knowing whether or not they had the facilities with which to make them. All the procurement agencies would do would be to take the priorities permit which they had and go on a hunting expedition to see if they could find someone who could make the things they needed. The first thing they would know three claimants would be after one thing, and then the President would have to get Mr. Jimmy Byrnes—an able and distinguished man, and certainly I should be glad to see him in any capacity, however high; but here I am talking about principles, not personalities—the President would have to get Mr. Jimmy Byrnes or someone else to work on the matter.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to say to the Senator that I thoroughly agree with what he has said about the situation as it exists today, and I have great sympathy with his purpose; because before the so-called Gillette subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry we have run into exactly the same difficulties which the Senator outlined a moment ago. However, the question in my mind, and the one which bothered me, is: Does not Mr. Nelson have the power to do the very things about which the Senator has been talking?

Mr. PEPPER. I should say "No" to the Senator, for two or possibly three reasons. In the first place, Mr. Nelson is just getting back, by the skin of his teeth, the powers which he once delegated, but he is getting them back impaired. In other words, if in the beginning he had actually exercised the full power vested in him under the President's directive, with the fair implications deducible from it, he would have been the head of it, as was Bernard Baruch the head of the War Industries Board in the last war.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. But our friend did not do so. Instead, for many reasons which may to him have seemed adequate and wise—I am not prepared to say as to that—he delegated to others the powers as to procurement and the making of requirements; and he himself really had only a sketchy authority over critical materials. In other words, for example, even as to critical materials he did not say to the claimants, "All right; you can have only so much, and I will follow it through to see where it goes, to see that you are not hoarding, to see that the prime contractors are not getting more than their share or are not delegating too much to some subcontractor." He merely divided it up, and let it go where it would.

The second point is that the President's directive, construed one way—which might be a possible construction—gave the chairman of the War Production Board only the power to direct as to a procurement policy. It did not give him the power actually to set up procurement machinery. The result was that, insulated from actual operations by the military personnel, which was a hierarchy, of course, of all the military categories, by giving only a directive he did not get all the results which perhaps he anticipated achieving when he wrote the directive.

The third answer to the question as to why the power referred to is not already in existence is that under the terms of the bill the Director of the War Mobilization Board would be vested with some authority not included in the present directive—for example, economic stabilization, scientific and technical mobilization, and control of the manpower supply. Those are three fields which are not now dealt with by the War Production Board.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, let me say that the President now has the power to do substantially the things provided for in the bill.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; he has the power.

Mr. WHEELER. So it seems to me that there is a question whether we should pass legislation on the subject. I understand that when Mr. Nelson was first appointed the President gave him the power. It is true that Mr. Nelson delegated a part of his power to this man and a part to that one, and as a result we did not get from the War Production Board the kind of services which we should have had. I agree that the War Production Board has been in a rather bad state of affairs, and it has not improved to any extent over a period of 6 months at least. I think that something must be done about that. I do not think there is any question that something must be done about it.

However, the point I make is that at the present time the President has the power to do the very thing for which the Senator from Florida is contending; so the question is whether we should pass legislation to do something which the President already has the power to do.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to comment on that phase of the matter.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I think that the Senate has gone far afield in this matter. The motion before the Senate is one to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I happen to be a member—and, by inference, not to refer it to the Committee on Education and Labor, which during the last Congress considered the corresponding bill. I think it is a most unusual thing for the Senate by vote to take a bill away from a committee which has not yet had a chance as a whole committee to consider it, before that committee has really had an opportunity to act upon it, and by an action of the Senate itself to transfer the bill to another committee.

If conditions were reversed, and if the bill had been under consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs, I should feel exactly the same way. I think it is an unusual precedent which the Senate is trying to set by taking the bill away from the Committee on Education and Labor which has been holding hearings on the corresponding bill, and which has not as yet had a chance as a committee to vote on it, and arbitrarily to refer the bill to another committee for exactly the same consideration. For that reason I shall not support the motion of the able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. My question may be far afield, but I should like to ask the Senator another question on the bill, if I may do so. My question is in line with that propounded a moment ago by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. I was about to ask the Senator whether at the present time the President has the power to do the very thing for which the bill would provide? The answer of the Senator from Florida to the question propounded by the Senator from Montana was "Yes."

Mr. PEPPER. The bill contains certain provisions for authorization for appropriations, and the like, and I think it supplements the administrative power; but substantially the answer to that question is "Yes."

Mr. LUCAS. In addition to the authorization to set up the War Production Board, and giving Donald Nelson the power which he has under the directive, the President had the power to issue the directive at any time and to give the power to anyone.

Mr. PEPPER. There is no question about that.

Mr. LUCAS. Now I want to deal with the provisions of the bill as to functions and transfers of functions among agencies. I take it that is the meat of the bill; is that correct?

Mr. PEPPER. That is one of its provisions; yes.

Mr. LUCAS. In other words, section 7 (a) of the bill provides:

> There is hereby transferred to the Office of Production and Supply the functions and personnel of (1) the War Production Board and the Smaller War Plants Corporation.

A number of the powers of the War Production Board would be transferred to just one of the agencies of the War Mobilization Board; would they not?

Mr. PEPPER. That power would exist—the power to make transfers to this framework of an organization.

Mr. LUCAS. Whatever power is now lodged in the War Production Board would be transferred to the other agency; is that correct?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. The War Production Board would go out of existence so far as the War Production Board itself is concerned; is that correct?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. As to the Senator's second point—and as to it I see the trouble in connection with the bill, that it will not eliminate very many of the difficulties which we are trying to eliminate—let me read further from section 7 (a) of the bill:

> (2) Those subdivisions of the War, Navy, and Treasury Departments, of the Maritime Commission, and of the Office of Lend-Lease as shall be determined by the Director, subject to the approval of the President, as being related to, engaged in, or concerned with the procurement, manufacture, or other provision of war matériel.

My question is, Will there not be the same conflict and the same trouble between the various agencies named in subdivision (2) and the new agency provided for by the bill, insofar as those agencies may attempt to dominate or control the supply of various materials and various things which are set forth in that particular paragraph?

Mr. PEPPER. I should say "No" to the able Senator; because the War Mobilization Board, as adviser, and the Director of the War Mobilization Board, as Director, would have the power to reconcile all conflicts between the many subordinate agencies.

Mr. LUCAS. But they would not have the power to take the power away from the President, would they?

Mr. PEPPER. Of course not. No power is to be taken away from the President. Of course, he is the head of it all.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct; and in section 7 (a), subdivision (2), of the Office of War Mobilization bill, reference is made to—

> Those subdivisions of the War, Navy, and Treasury Departments, of the Maritime Commission, and of the Office of Lend-Lease as shall be determined by the Director, subject to the approval of the President.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. The point I make is that when the Director determines whatever is necessary, the War Department, the Navy Department, the Office of Lend-Lease, and all of the other agencies will start all over again the trouble which we are having at the present time, and the President will be between two fires, just as he is between two fires at this very moment.

Mr. PEPPER. No, Mr. President; I would not agree with the Senator as to that point; because the Director of the War Mobilization Board would be the effective operating head of war production, and would have the power to lay down policy or to give instructions which would avoid or reconcile conflicts.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator as to that; but the Senator's statement does not answer my question.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the Senate has been very kind, and I wish to approach a conclusion of what I have to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to comment on the remark of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN]. The bill which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] introduced, for himself and other Senators, in the last session, was not referred by the Senate to the Committee on Education and Labor. It was referred to that committee under the old rule whereby a Senator could write on the bill the name of the committee to which he wished to have it referred and by which he wished it considered.

The reference moved by the Senator from North Carolina would not result in having the Senate take away from a committee a bill which had previously been referred by the Senate, because the bill was never referred to the committee by the Senate.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, if that is not exactly what happened—that the bill was referred to the committee by the Senate—I do not know what we could call it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, Mr. President, if I wanted to have a certain committee conduct hearings on a certain subject, under the old rule I would pick out the committee which I thought would give me the best run for my money. I have no objection to that; but the bill which is the subject of the motion of the Senator from North Carolina is a bill which should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs in the first place.

Mr. TRUMAN. Not necessarily; any one of three or four committees could have had jurisdiction of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course, the Senator and I do not agree about that. I say that the bill should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs; I say it should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs in the first place. However, it did not go there. I cannot help that but I am going to do the best I can to see that it now goes to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, there can be plenty of argument on that matter, because any one of four committees could have had the bill referred to it; any one of them has just as much jurisdiction of the subject as any of the others; and the chairman of any one of the other three committees could make the same motion the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has made.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me say that it is my judgment that, as between the various committees, the Committee on Military Affairs should have had the bill originally, rather than the Committee on Education and Labor. However, the bill was not at that time referred by the Senate to the Committee on Military Affairs. This is the first time that the matter has been before the whole Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I desire to conclude what I have to say. As the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] has pointed out, the bill, having to do with the matter of war production, would properly come within the scope of a number of different Senate committees.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection if the other two want to get in, but it happens that two of us are contending, and it is my contention that as between the Military Affairs Committee and the Committee on Education and Labor, while the latter had it originally, yet if the question had been submitted to the Senate, I believe the measure would not have been sent to that committee; but inasmuch as the question was not submitted this is the first time the matter has been before the whole Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I started to say—and I should like to finish my remarks—as the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] has pointed out, this bill having to do with the whole program of war production would probably come within the scope of a number of different Senate committees. I mentioned a while ago the Naval Affairs Committee, because, of course, the bill affects the Navy in the prosecution of the war. The Military Affairs Committee, for obvious reasons, might also be included, and I might likewise include the Foreign Relations Committee, because it affects lend-lease. I could also include the Banking and Currency Committee, because the bill affects the Office of Price Administration, the legislation for which has been constantly handled by the Banking and Currency Committee. I might also include the Committee on Education and Labor, which has had to do with legislation pertaining to labor and vocational training.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where the Senate has taken any position with regard to the reference of bills which include several subjects which, if separated, might have gone to other committees, the Senate has not, even under its own loose rule, adopted the practice of sending a bill to a committee which has jurisdiction merely of something which is more or less incidental to the proposed legislation and which might have been sent to another committee if it had been introduced separately, but where there has been any rule at all it has been the practice to send the bill to the committee that had jurisdiction of the major portion of the subject matter covered by the measure, although it included many subjects which, if separately introduced, could have gone to other committees. In the case of an omnibus bill, such as this is apparently, dealing with a good many subjects, which might have been dealt with separately by other committees, the Senate has ordered—and I think properly—the Presiding Officer to send the bill to that committee which had jurisdiction of the major portion of the subject matter under consideration.

It would be impossible to send this bill or any similar bill to all the committees which might have jurisdiction. If so, we never would get anywhere in finally enacting legislation.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask the able leader if he knows of a case where a committee which actually has jurisdiction of the subject and which had been given consideration of a bill has been discharged from the consideration of it unless the Senate felt it had been delinquent in its treatment of the measure?

Mr. BARKLEY. I cannot, without looking up the records, refer to any such situation, and I am willing to concede it has never occurred; but the question is where the bill ought to go and not where it was sent at the request of the author. The Senator from Florida will recall that when the former Vice President announced that obiter dictum from the Vice President's desk that any Senator could have a bill referred to any committee he wanted it referred, I challenged his statement; I protested against such a rule. It is not a rule, and it does not make for orderly procedure in the Senate. I protested against it and urged the Vice President then not to announce any such rule.

Later, when we came into the present session, the steering committee unanimously instructed me to protest to the Vice President against adherence to any such announcement as that heretofore made and to exercise the right to send bills to committees to which they should be sent.

I am not injecting myself into the argument of the Senator; but, in view of that action, I myself do not feel bound by any improper reference of a bill introduced at another session, if it was improperly referred at the time it was introduced. Whether I take any part in this debate or not is not material, but if I should do so I should feel myself called upon to discuss that point because all pending measures die at the end of a Congress; every bill that has heretofore been introduced and not acted upon by both Houses has to be introduced anew. What the Senate would have done originally if this matter had been submitted to it when the bill was introduced by the Senator from Florida and the Senator from West Virginia I do not know; I would not prophesy as to that, although I presume we would then have been debating what we are now debating as to the propriety of the jurisdiction of two committees or any committee. I myself, however, do not feel bound, from a parliamentary or legislative standpoint, by any action of a previous Congress if the action was an improper action or if the reference, made under that loose rule, was an improper reference; and it is for the Senate to decide about that.

I do not feel bound by action taken, as might be said by unanimous consent, because no question was raised. When a bill is introduced and the authors of the bill name the committee to which they want it referred, as a rule, nobody makes any objection. Probably, as a rule, Senators do not know to which committee a bill is referred when it is introduced. When a bill is introduced, and the Chair says "the bill will be appropriately referred," Members do not inquire, as a rule, or have not heretofore, as to where the bill would go. If the question had been raised at the time the bill was originally introduced, the Senate might have acted differently; but, whatever it might have done, I do not feel its action applies now to my position as to the reference of this bill.

Mr. PEPPER. It seems to me that what the Senate would be disposed to do would be to reserve the power, which of course it has after the Committee on Education and Labor has concluded its investigation and after the full committee has had an opportunity to pass upon the bill and make its recommendations, to refer it to the Military Affairs Committee or any other committee before it came to the Senate floor. That is not an unusual procedure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not desire to prolong the discussion, but I think it would be better for the Senate deliberately to refer this bill to the wrong committee, and let it stay there, than to refer it to the wrong committee with the understanding that it could vote it out and then the Senate could send it to the right committee before acting on it, assuming that the Committee on Military Affairs was the right committee, and the Committee on Education and Labor was the wrong committee. I would make the same statement as to any other committee.

I think the question of jurisdiction of the legislation itself ought to be settled by the Senate. I think it has brought about and is going to continue to bring about confusion and chaos and duplication. I agree with what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] said this morning, as well as what other Senators said, that the Senate of the United States has got sense enough to decide where legislation of this kind ought to go. It should settle the question once and for all, so that we would not have four or five committees investigating the same subject, which is not only expensive but the committees are likely to bring in conflicting reports, so that we would have difficulty in knowing which horn of the dilemma to take. I think it is exceedingly important for the Senate to decide the question of jurisdiction. When it has decided that question, I think the bill should remain in the committee to which it is decided it should go.

I cannot myself adhere to the suggestion that if for any reason a bill ought to go to one committee when that committee reports to the Senate it should then be referred to another committee for another report. Suppose the Committee on Education and Labor reported it favorably, and it went back to the Military Affairs Committee and they reported adversely, where would we be?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, it is not an unthinkable experience where several different committees have legitimate jurisdiction of a bill that it should be submitted to more than one committee before it actually comes to the Senate floor. I know of a good many instances of that kind. For example, we had a treaty before the Foreign Relations Committee to set up an international bank in Central and South America. The Foreign Relations Committee reported favorably upon that proposal, but, upon the request of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the able senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the bill was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, and was subsequently considered by that committee, but was not reported.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think that grew out of the fact that there was an international question involved of which the Foreign Relations Committee felt it had jurisdiction, and, at the same time, there was a banking question involved over which the Committee on Banking and Currency had jurisdiction; but before the bill was referred to any committee, as I recall, it was understood that it would be referred later to the Banking and Currency Committee if the Foreign Relations Committee reported it. I may be mistaken but that is my recollection.

Mr. PEPPER. I think the Senator is in error there because it was only after the Foreign Relations Committee had considered it that the request was made, if I recall correctly, that the treaty be sent to the Banking and Currency Committee. The situation prevailing there is just the situation prevailing here. The Committee on Education and Labor, by virtue of having jurisdiction over labor legislation, is a legitimate holder of a part of this jurisdiction just as the Foreign Relations Committee, the Banking and Currency Committee, the Naval Affairs Committee, the Military Affairs Committee, and other committees of the Senate.

Mr. President, all I was saying was that I thought it might be possible for a standing committee to conclude an investigation it had begun upon a subject with respect to which it had concurrent jurisdiction. We might as well settle that question also while we are settling the question, Is the Military Affairs Committee going to handle the whole manpower problem including civilian labor legislation because we happen to be in a war and it has jurisdiction over military supplies?

A few days ago the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] indicated a desire to propose a study of the subject of manpower. It is now being carried on by the Committee on Appropriations, because that was the only committee which had over-all jurisdiction. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had jurisdiction over agricultural labor, the Committee on Education and Labor had jurisdiction over labor legislation, the Committee on Military Affairs had jurisdiction over military personnel. But today the Senate Committee on Military Affairs is passing on the nominations to the War Manpower Commission, who are literally and exclusively civilian personnel. Does that mean that the military is to operate the civilian functions, as well as military?

A few days ago this same conflict arose between the Committee on Education and Labor and the Committee on Military Affairs. I ventured to make the point on the floor of the Senate why nominations of civilian personnel should have to go before the Committee on Military Affairs. I am not questioning the personnel of that committee, which could not be improved on, but if we are to talk about fairness respecting the jurisdiction of the several committees, surely some of these other committees have a legitimate right, as well as our distinguished Committee on Military Affairs. If our committee, or if any other committee, had come in and made a motion to oust the Committee on Military Affairs from jurisdiction, I dare say very serious consideration would not have been given to the effort.

We are not trying to keep the Committee on Military Affairs from getting the jurisdiction, although it is singular that all of a sudden such great interest has been developed on the subject by the Committee on Military Affairs, and efforts made to take jurisdiction of the subject, notwithstanding the fact that it is being considered by another committee, and notwithstanding the fact that the question is not whether they shall consider it before it goes to the Senate or not. The question is whether one committee shall be stopped from considering it and the other committee given exclusive jurisdiction to consider it.

I am not coming here to block any other jurisdiction, I am not saying that there should not be half a dozen committees considering the subject. It affects a great many of them. Here is an over-all bill, and a committee is considering an over-all bill. Let me say it is a pretty general adage of the law that a man cannot sit in his own case. We are talking about taking power away from the Military and Naval Establishments in the public interest. I do not know but that that question can be better considered by a committee not so intimately related to those Establishments. We are talking about over-all civilian production for war, and these agencies cannot be expected to support a measure which contemplates a diminution of their power. Yet, when the question of the diminution of their power is brought up, committees which are intimately and inextricably related to that subject personally, philosophically, and legislatively are called upon to make the sole decision.

Mr. President, I venture to say right now that production and procurement are likely to be affected if some agency which does not have that intimacy of relationship does hear other people, and approaches this matter from another point of view.

Small business is suffering in the United States because of the procurement program this Government has been following already in this war, and economic casualties are paying a terrific price because we have not really someone in charge of war production with the power to coordinate the procurement of the whole United States Government. I say that if something like this bill is not enacted, the war will be prolonged, and American soldiers and sailors and gallant airmen will pay in their blood for the deficiency of the Government and its agencies.

Able Senators have asked whether the President did not have power to do what is proposed. Yes; he does have the power. Should not the President have done it? Yes; he should have, if I may venture to say so. I make this as a constructive suggestion, as a friend of the President and of this administration. People are tired of frustration, and I am tired of it with them, and as a faithful Democratic New Dealer I am going to try to cure the deficiency of this administration; and it is a matter of principle and not of personality when I do it. I do not like to appear in the role of being critical of these distinguished gentlemen, every one of whom I admire and esteem, but I do not think the Army can handle procurement as effectively as I think civilians can handle it, if it is properly set up; and feeling that way, it is my duty to say so.

Consider what the Army did. They used to have six or eight different procurement agencies. What did the President do? He put them all into one. He divided the whole Army up into three branches only—air, ground forces, and procurement. Can the officials deny that a principle applicable to the Army is not well applicable to the whole production effort? We have consolidation of the control of critical materials under Mr. Ferdinand Eberstadt—the critical materials of the whole country. We have concentration of authority over manpower—manpower of the whole Nation. Is it not well that all these various agencies be coordinated under some head? Can the President do everything personally? Or should not the Congress help him in trying to set up an effective administrative organization?

Mr. President, I had no idea of taking so much of the time of the Senate. I have seen these conflicts in the hearings we have had in the Committee on Education and Labor. I saw the Army and the Navy call on the Procurement Service to take doctors out of the civilian population, and they took them without the slightest regard for the effect upon the civilian population of those doctors being taken into the service.

When we were leaving some of our areas, like some of those in the South, with 1 doctor to every 7,000 or 5,000 people, when some States were contributing over 200 percent of their doctor quota, there was not anyone who had anything to do with the coordination of that program to the civilian and the military and naval economies. But when we made this investigation and pointed out what was going on, we discovered the situation, and the services themselves later came in and said that the matter should be corrected. Finally Mr. McNutt, given command over both civilian manpower and the acquisition of service doctors, said to the services, "Gentlemen, I am going to keep one doctor to every 1,500 people. That is all there is to it. You have to make the best use you can of these doctors you have." There was a case in which everyone was doing his job perfectly honestly, but the results were not coordinated until Mr. McNutt was made the head.

Right now we are discussing the size of the Army. No one has been considering just what actual effect the size of the Army would have on agricultural and industrial production. Finally it winds up in the Committee on Appropriations, who are trying to make some over-all disposition of the matter. Someone should have been able to come here from the administrative agencies and say, "Gentlemen, this is the way it works out. Take so many from here and so many from there. This is what we have left. This is what we have obligated ourselves to do. This is the way we plan to supply the deficiency." That would be control of the manpower resources of the Nation, and not a slipshod control of the effort.

If the Senate does not find that the committee has been lacking in diligence, or in the sincerity of its approach, if it has made some contribution to the subject, naturally the committee would like to continue until it feels that it can bring the matter to the attention of the Senate, or of some other committee.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Merely for the sake of the record, I should like to say I was a member of the subcommittee which made this report, and, without passing on the merits of the bill, I declined to approve the report, because I considered the evidence before the committee insufficient to support either the report or the bill. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator, and thank the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to take but a few minutes of the time of the Senate, on a matter which has already consumed a good deal of time. I have often wondered, during the course of the afternoon, whether we were discussing the question of the committee to which the bill should be referred, or were discussing the merits of the subject itself.

The subject matter of the bill has much merit, and I should be one of the first to agree that steps can be taken and should be taken to coordinate and centralize the control of our production set-up, and that we must take the necessary steps to avoid duplication and waste. But I do not believe that is the question which is at stake here this afternoon. We have before us the simple question of the committee to which the bill is to be referred. It is a simple question, and it is not at all an unprecedented question. I have known of a similar question arising during my fairly brief service in the Senate. It is not a question of insulting anyone.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. So that we may follow the Senator's argument, will he please cite a case in his experience like the instant case?

Mr. LODGE. While I have not looked it up, I can remember a similar case in 1937 or 1938, when there was a question of referring a bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency or to some other committee. I cannot give the details now, but I shall be very glad to look the matter up and furnish the details tomorrow.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Let me ask a Senator whether at that time one committee had taken the bill, had held hearings running into thousands of pages, and had brought out a preliminary report?

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall as to that.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Let me ask a further question of the Senator from Massachusetts, since he referred to the fact that a similar situation had arisen very often. Does he know of a single occasion when, in the midst of hearings and before a bill had actually been considered by the full committee to which it had been referred, the chairman of another committee rose in the Senate and asked that a bill under consideration be referred to his committee?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that is what is happening now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I do not yield at the moment; I wish to answer the question of the Senator from Utah.

I do not think that is what is happening here. There is no intention of taking the bill away from a committee in the middle of hearings. The last Congress came to an end in December. We have in the new Congress many new Members. We started in afresh in the beginning of January this year. It is not a question of taking a bill away from a committee in the middle of hearings.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to refresh the recollection of the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. During the last session a bill was introduced which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY]. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] and others of his associates on his committee took the bill away from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and had it referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, after the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had had possession of a similar bill for a considerable time, and had done considerable work on it. The bill to which I referred was taken away from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, after it had considered similar proposed legislation, and it was referred to the same committee which now proposes to take jurisdiction of the bill under consideration. I make that statement to refresh the recollection of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Kentucky will continue to refresh his memory completely. It seems to me that the Senate Committee on Education and Labor had the housing question before it at the time to which the Senator refers. That committee had considered the legislation establishing the United States Housing Authority. The Senate Committee on Education and Labor found no objection at all when housing matters were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. But there came a time when it was suggested that the original committee should carry on. The chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor took no part at all in that controversy, except to vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] made the motion, and the same committee which is now trying to get jurisdiction over the pending bill, took over the other bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should rather continue with my statement now. I did not mean to get into a discussion as to past dealings in referring bills to committees, because I do not think that is a very significant aspect of this matter. It is a perfectly simple procedure, as we all know, for a Senator to write the name of a committee on a bill, and then to have the bill referred to the committee he indicates, unless some point is raised. It is perfectly well known that when the new session of Congress begins we start in afresh. We have a great many new Members; and it is not a question of taking a bill away from a committee, and it is not a case of reflecting in any way upon any committee. Certainly there is no better friend of national defense than the Senator from Utah. He is also a very faithful and valuable member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and there is no question at all of in any way reflecting on any member of his committee.

Moreover, I think the Senators who introduced this bill have performed a service in bringing up the subject. It is a subject which was brought up in the Stettinius report back in 1939, the contents of which, unfortunately, were not made available to the American people. The subject of coordinating and centralizing the control of the production of weapons is an old subject, and it is a great pity that there has been delay on the part of the administration in coming to grips with it for so many years. So as far as the measure being referred to the Committee on Military Affairs is concerned, there is no question of burying it. It will be considered. There would be no question of not reading all the testimony and going ahead.

I agree that there is no committee which has over-all jurisdiction, and that a bill of this kind raises so many different questions that one cannot say with any definiteness that it belongs in this committee or does not belong in that one.

A great many different factors are involved; but there is one factor which, in my humble opinion, has not been given due weight here this afternoon. We have heard about defense migration; we have heard about defense housing; we have heard about small business; we have heard about many different factors that are connected with war production, but there has not been sufficient emphasis, in my judgment, placed on the question of getting weapons for the soldier, and that is what this is all about. That is why this subject has always been considered primarily a military subject, because the goal and objective of all this effort is to supply weapons for the soldier.

When we look at the history of this war up to date, and look at the weapons the soldier has received, insofar as I have had any chance to have any personal experience, I think the job has been extremely well done. The weapons have been good. I think that in tanks, for example, we are ahead of the rest of the world. I call Senators' attention to the 105 caliber, self-propelled mount, which has had such a decisive effect in North Africa. One of the reasons why that weapon has been as good and satisfactory as it has been, and has given the soldier the best chance of coming out alive on the battlefield, is that the uniformed services have had control of the procurement of that article, because they have had the right to go into the factory and take a piece of chalk and mark the thing up, and get the thing done exactly the way they wanted it done. That is a tremendously important factor.

I do not say that perhaps the power of the Army should not be curtailed, or that the power of the Navy should not be curtailed. I do not say that the Senator from Florida is not right in saying that we should take it away from them, though he would have to be more eloquent than he has been this afternoon to convince me of it. But I do say that when that question is raised it should not be treated in a left-handed manner or as an incident. We should realize that we are making a major decision, and that we want to have it before a body which will entertain the views of the War Department as well as the views of others.

Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] earlier in the afternoon said that his sole object in asking that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor was so that we could get prompt action; that the Committee on Education and Labor had had the subject before it; that the committee had taken 1,400 pages of testimony on it; and that it had heard all the witnesses, and is ready "to shoot."

Then, Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] comes along and points out, I think very interestingly, that his committee had not heard all the witnesses interested; that they had heard largely from representatives of airplane factories, but they have not heard from the War Department or the Navy Department, and they have not heard from a number of agencies whose views, whether we agree with them or whether we do not, are entitled to be heard, are entitled to be weighed, and are entitled to be analyzed.

So it seems to me that we ought to be happy that this bill has had the consideration that it has had at the hands of the subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor. We ought to be happy that we have gotten the testimony from the airplane manufacturers; but we ought also to recognize that there is a positive need for the bill to be considered from other standpoints from which it has never been considered at all. So for that reason I hope that the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Could not the objective which the Senator from Massachusetts has stated very ably, and I think quite properly, be completely accomplished and all interest expressed here today be at the same time satisfied by allowing the Committee on Education and Labor to finish its study, for whatever it may be worth, and then allow the bill to go to the Committee on Military Affairs for such consideration as that committee might want to give to it, before it comes to the Senate floor?

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] is the principal introducer of the bill. I am one of the cointroducers of the bill. Several other Senators are cointroducers of the bill. We are not in any sense of the word denying the right and the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to consider those aspects of the measure which it deems important to consider, but would the Senator from Massachusetts think it inappropriate for other aspects to be considered also before the matter is disposed of? I was wondering if the Senator would not think that the best interest could be served by letting the study which is being made of the matter by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor be finished, and then let us have an understanding that immediately thereafter it be ordered by the Senate that before the bill shall come back to the floor it shall go to the Committee on Military Affairs for its consideration?

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator from West Virginia to say that the subcommittee action had virtually been completed.

Mr. PEPPER. No, Mr. President; excuse me——

Mr. LODGE. Then there is a difference of opinion between the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I think the able Senator from West Virginia probably was not wholly correct in his surmise. The very reason that the subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor had not called the Government's representatives was so that we could confront them with the major criticisms and instances of dissatisfaction and insufficiency that might have been experienced in the country by people who were participating or who were really effective in carrying on this production program. We intended in time, as soon as we got the other data before the committee, to give those people an opportunity to be heard. All we are asking now is that certain aspects of the matter in which we are interested be considered also. We are not trying to deny the jurisdiction of the Military Affairs Committee, but are asking that that committee wait a little while in claiming its jurisdiction, until we shall have finished our study.

Mr. President, I do not see how it could do any harm to have the bill referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. If that is not done it will mean that we shall be stopped in the middle of what we have contemplated to do, and that we will not get a chance, of course, to say anything more about those aspects in which our committee is interested.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it seems to me that one of the merits of the committee system in the Senate is that after a good many years it educates the Senators who are members of committees. I know that has been true in my case. A Senator serves on a committee and comes in daily contact with a certain set of problems and becomes educated in connection with them and obtains a certain familiarity with them. I am delighted that the members of the Committee on Education and Labor who have had a constant contact with questions of manpower and questions of civilian personnel have had a chance to study this bill. I think now the Senate would be best served if the committee which has been educated along military lines, of thinking of the soldier and thinking in military terms, should have a chance to pass on the measure.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I wish to say only a word or two before the vote is taken, in order that we may keep the record straight with reference to what we have done as a committee.

First of all, I wish to say that a jurisdictional dispute is something which I have always tried to avoid. It is something into which I, as chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, after having sat through 2 full years of discussion about jurisdictional disputes, would never attempt to enter unless I found it to be unavoidable.

So far as we are concerned, the whole point of the controversy seems to hinge on the question of whether the subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor has done a good job. If there is any question on that score in the mind of any Senator, I shall remain on my feet for some time and present to the Senate some of the information which the subcommittee has obtained. I do not believe there is any question about it. There could not be.

At the last session a bill similar to the one under discussion was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. I do not know whether it was referred to that committee by request, but it came to me, and, as chairman, it became my task to appoint a subcommittee to consider it.

The subcommittee was appointed with care and forethought. It will be noted that because there seemed to be a conflict—especially with regard to the important question of manpower—between the Committee on Education and Labor and the Committee on Military Affairs, the chairman saw to it that one of the coauthors of the military manpower bill was appointed as a member of the subcommittee. Then, in order that the Military Affairs Committee might not be put at a disadvantage in what it was doing, I deliberately chose another member of that committee to serve on the subcommittee. In that way ample opportunity was afforded to prevent duplication so far as the hearings were concerned.

Mr. President, any Member of the Senate who will examine the hearings of the Military Affairs Committee on its manpower bill, as well as the hearings on the bill conducted by the Committee on Education and Labor, will discover that there has been no duplication. The Committee on Education and Labor has been interested primarily in the discovery of manpower resources in the United States.

The Committee on Military Affairs has properly been interested in manpower from the standpoint of seeing that nothing is allowed to interfere with the proper growth and development of our Army as well as its proper care.

The chairman of the Education and Labor Committee happens to be a member of the Military Affairs Committee. There could not be any conflict in his mind with regard to jurisdiction. It seems to me that if the Senate is to enter into this type of controversy regarding jurisdiction, and the pending question is put to a vote—especially since there have been implications that certain persons who are sometimes called bureaucrats are interested in having the subject of the bill taken from one committee and transferred to another for their purposes—it will be one of the most dangerous things in which we can indulge.

Two or three days ago, Mr. President, I heard an extremely eloquent speech delivered by the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], wherein he said that the issue before the people of the country is a simple one, namely, whether the Government of the United States shall be taken from the bureaucrats and given back to the people.

Mr. President, I shall watch with all the care that I can exercise how the voting on the pending question is done on the other side of this Chamber, because Members there know that an attempt has been made by certain persons, whom they label "bureaucrats," to have the subject matter of the bill transferred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I am a member of the Military Affairs Committee. We discussed the bill in that committee. I do not believe that the suggestion of the pending motion had its origin in the Military Affairs Committee. That committee would not have thought of making such a suggestion if it had not received requests to do so. I do not believe that members of the Military Affairs Committee have read the hearings or even the report of the subcommittee on the bill.

From the standpoint of what the Senate should do in the matter, the question is quite different from that which has been argued this afternoon, namely, whether the bill should become law. I return to the question which I asked the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER]. If any of the persons to whom he referred desired to take care of their interests, would they not think that the proper way to do so would be by suggesting that the subject of the bill be transferred? As chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, I have a telephone. I am on pretty good terms with the heads of the departments. I have not had any trouble with them, and I would be as reasonable as any man on earth in seeing that full opportunity was given to the head of any department to present whatever appropriate argument he cared to present to the committee.

The chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor recalls very distinctly that at the last session the chairman of the Committee on Finance called attention to the fact that a part of a certain bill which our committee had reported vitally affected his committee. We never made any objection, and neither did the chairman of the subcommittee make any objection to the bill being referred to the Committee on Finance. We have never been jealous of any other committee.

In the last session, both the junior and senior Senator from Texas introduced separate bills pertaining to labor, and had them referred to the Judiciary Committee. Not one word of protest came from the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, and not one protest will come now.

If the bill under discussion goes to the Committee on Military Affairs, the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor will take part in the deliberations concerning the bill, and will attempt to inform the committee relative to the facts he obtained when hearings were held before the Committee on Education and Labor.

It seems to me that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said exactly the right thing. All committees of this body are merely committees of the United States Senate. They have no final jurisdiction over anything. They merely report to the Senate. They all have an equal task. They act for the Senate in making preliminary arrangements, making reports, holding hearings, and making recommendations.

Mr. President, I trust that as a result of the vote which is about to be taken there will not go out from this Chamber the implication that a committee of the Senate is being reprimanded for the way in which it has handled a certain bill, and that another committee of the Senate has decided to take possession of the bill because it does not like it. Without a duplication of effort, how can the Committee on Military Affairs consider the bill except by either starting over again or building upon that which the Committee on Education and Labor has already done?

Shall we ignore the work which has already been done, and turn the subject over to another committee, to start from the beginning? Shall we completely turn our backs upon that which has already been accomplished?

Mr. President, everyone knows that the bill is as controversial as any that can come before the Senate during wartime. Everyone, therefore, realizes that any chairman would like to be rid of such a bill. It would have been a joy had the matter been handled in the right way, and had jurisdiction been requested. A telephone call would have taken care of it, I am sure. However, that was not done.

Mr. President, the Committee on Education and Labor stands before the country rebuked by Members of the Senate who have not read the committee's reports or its deliberations, and have not given the committee an opportunity to make a report on the bill.

This matter is out of the ordinary, and every Senator knows it to be. I should not be fair to myself, my committee, or my subcommittee, if I did not say what I have said.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Was the Senator a member of the subcommittee which held hearings on this matter?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator from Utah is chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, and appointed the subcommittee which held hearings on the bill. At the request of the chairman of the subcommittee, who had to be absent, the chairman presided over one hearing only.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Were hearings held, and was testimony taken?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Hearings were held and testimony was taken. Two volumes of the hearings have been printed and are available to Senators. One preliminary report has been made. The Senator has a copy of it on his desk.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator feel that the subcommittee finished its hearings and covered the ground?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. No; the subcommittee has not finished its hearings. As soon as the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor was informed that the bill had been ordered to lie on the table he asked the chairman of the subcommittee not to hold any more hearings until a meeting of the full committee could be held, otherwise hearings would be going on at this time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let me ask how long it has been since the subcommittee ceased holding hearings?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The subcommittee ceased holding hearings with the end of the last Congress.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, let me say that I have just read the preliminary report of the subcommittee. It seems to me it raises some very important questions. I should almost say that it is a severe indictment of our program of carrying on the war.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, does not that merely bear out all that I have said? That is talking about the bill itself. The bill has not had consideration by the committee; and until the committee has considered the bill it seems to me that the subcommittee and the committee itself should not be chastised for not considering it properly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if there is no further debate on the motion I suppose we might proceed to a vote. I think it desirable to dispose of the motion this afternoon. I think we should have a quorum present at the time when the motion is disposed of. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Aiken | George | Pepper |
| Andrews | Gerry | Reed |
| Austin | Gurney | Reynolds |
| Bankhead | Hawkes | Russell |
| Barkley | Hill | Shipstead |
| Bilbo | Holman | Stewart |
| Bone | Johnson, Colo. | Taft |
| Brewster | Kilgore | Thomas, Idaho |
| Bridges | La Follette | Thomas, Utah |
| Brooks | Langer | Tobey |
| Burton | Lodge | Truman |
| Bushfield | Lucas | Tunnell |
| Butler | McClellan | Tydings |
| Byrd | McFarland | Vandenberg |
| Capper | McNary | Van Nuys |
| Caraway | Maloney | Wallgren |
| Chandler | Maybank | Walsh |
| Chavez | Millikin | Wheeler |
| Clark, Idaho | Moore | Wherry |
| Clark, Mo. | Murray | Wiley |
| Danaher | Nye | Willis |
| Ellender | O'Mahoney | |
| Ferguson | Overton | |

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. Not knowing how the Senator from New York would vote on this motion, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I am not advised how he would vote if present. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senators from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. O'DANIEL], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are detained on official business for the Senate.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee would vote "yea," and the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is necessarily absent on official business. He has been paired by transfer. If present, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] is absent on public business.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BUCK] is unavoidably detained. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—39

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Austin | Ferguson | O'Mahoney |
| Barkley | George | Reed |
| Bilbo | Gerry | Reynolds |
| Bridges | Gurney | Russell |
| Brooks | Hill | Stewart |
| Burton | Holman | Thomas, Idaho |
| Bushfield | Johnson, Colo. | Tobey |
| Butler | Lodge | Tydings |
| Byrd | Lucas | Wallgren |
| Chandler | McClellan | Walsh |
| Clark, Idaho | McNary | Wheeler |
| Clark, Mo. | Maloney | Wiley |
| Danaher | Moore | Willis |

NAYS—28

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Aiken | Kilgore | Shipstead |
| Andrews | La Follette | Taft |
| Bankhead | Langer | Thomas, Utah |
| Bone | McFarland | Truman |
| Brewster | Maybank | Tunnell |
| Capper | Millikin | Vandenberg |
| Caraway | Murray | Van Nuys |
| Chavez | Nye | Wherry |
| Ellender | Overton | |
| Hawkes | Pepper | |

NOT VOTING—29

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Bailey | Downey | Hatch |
| Ball | Eastland | Hayden |
| Barbour | Gillette | Johnson, Calif. |
| Buck | Glass | McCarran |
| Connally | Green | McKellar |
| Davis | Guffey | Mead |

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Murdock | Robertson | Wagner |
| O'Daniel | Scrugham | White |
| Radcliffe | Smith | Wilson |
| Revercomb | Thomas, Okla. | |

So Mr. REYNOLDS' motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. 607) was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE PRODUCTION, TRANSPORTATION, AND MARKETING OF WOOL

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 93) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the membership of the special committee authorized by Senate Resolution 160, Seventy-fourth Congress, agreed to July 10, 1935, to investigate the producton, transportation, and marketing of wool, as extended, is hereby increased to six members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pursuant to the terms of the resolution, the Chair appoints the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] a member of the committee.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn to Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 8, 1943, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the Father of our spirits, before whose eyes nothing is concealed, we rejoice that Thou dost know us and dost consider us in mercy. We pray for the discouraged, for the tempted and for all who are far from the covenant of promise. Give us the tranquillity of those feelings which rise above aspirations born in the things of time. Quicken us not only with a creed but with an experience, with inspiration rather than with restraint. Do Thou make us strong, have pity on what we are, reveal to us what we should be and with Thy saving presence help us to translate our visions of righteous duty into abiding reality.

Oh, crown us with the sacrificial spirit of service and with a living faith that cannot fail and which is ready to battle against those iniquitous lands which are staining the seas of the world with innocent blood. Oh, sustain our country with an unwithering and with an unwasting power of her great soul, that all dreams of a good world shall not perish from the heart of man. We pray for our chivalrous President, our Speaker, and all Members of the Congress; guide us through working hours and at evening time give us peace. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill H. R. 1408, to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter I wrote to Secretary of Agriculture Wickard.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix and include an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

HON. GEORGE P. DARROW

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, my predecessor from the Seventh Congressional District of Pennsylvania, the Honorable George P. Darrow, is 84 years of age today. He is full of years, fruitful years, of service to others. Those of you who know him, know that this, his birthday, will be a day of recollections and fond memories of those with whom he served in this House during 24 years. I know on the occasion of my visits to him that he valued most of all those recollections; and may I take the liberty of suggesting to those Members of this House who served with him that it would make his heart very happy indeed if you were to send him some communication on this his eighty-fourth birthday.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. As one who served with Mr. Darrow for probably two decades, I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that no man who has ever served in this House was held in higher esteem. You may send him this message, and I am sure it reflects the feelings of the Members at least on this side of the aisle. That we all wish for him an abundance of those things which Shakespeare said should accompany old age. Honor, love, obedience, and troops of friends.

Mr. SCOTT. And I know he will be glad to receive your message, and many similar expressions of good will from both sides of the aisle.

[Here the gavel fell.]

A PACIFIC WAR COUNCIL SHOULD BE CREATED

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, a separate Pacific war council should be set up at once. Every day of delay is dangerous. Every day of delay gives the Japanese precious time to dig in and fortify those areas so ruthlessly overrun. Nothing is more vital to the preservation of our American way of life than the defeat of Japan's war lords. Their ideologies and ours cannot exist side by side. We tried it. Pearl Harbor is the answer. As early as 1900 the citizens of San Francisco sponsored anti-Japanese legislation. In 1904 national sentiment had crystallized to the extent that the American Federation of Labor adopted resolutions asking permanent exclusion of the Japanese. We of the Pacific coast know whereof we speak. I cannot urge too strongly the supreme importance of the Pacific war area to our country's very existence.

LABOR DISTURBANCE IN THE SAN FRANCISCO BAY AREA

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

[Mr. ANDERSON of California addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Billings Gazette published in Billings, Mont.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR]?

There was no objection.

(Mr. BURDICK asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include an item on lard from the Farm Journal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLEVENGER]?

There was no objection.

FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MILLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House and the public must know by this time that ample production of food for our armed forces is essential if we are to win this war. We hear on the floor of the House every day, complaints against the several departments of Government, because the responsible departments have done little or nothing to help solve the agricultural problems or the man-labor problems of this Nation.

I hope you will read the resolution which I am asking to be printed in the RECORD. This resolution was presented by the farmers of western Nebraska and suggests the solving of certain problems in connection with agriculture if crops are to be planted and harvested. The need for more help on the farm will become more and more acute unless something is done to relieve the shortage. The farmers of America must be provided with sufficient farm machinery and parts for repair if they are going to produce the food so badly needed for our fighting forces. The farmer must also be guaranteed a profit for the crop he raises. Under the present conditions the farmers are finding it impossible to compete with defense industry in the matter of wages and hours of labor.

It is a responsibility of Congress to do everything possible to assist agriculture. Let us pray God that it will not be necessary to have several million hungry stomachs in order to make those in authority take the proper steps in seeing that the farmer is not only given the necessary machinery but a profit for his efforts and labor for the production of food.

MEETING OF THE HOUSE AT 11 O'CLOCK

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet tomorrow at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK]?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may sit this afternoon during the session of the House in connection with the aviation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a letter from the San Francisco Labor Council signed by John F. Shelley, president, and John A. O'Connell, secretary, and attached statement with reference to interference on the part of the National Labor Relations Board with contracts now in existence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution adopted by the Lions Club of Riverton, Wyo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. BARRETT]?

There was no objection.

(Mr. LAMBERTSON asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

MOVING THE CAPITAL OF THE UNITED STATES WEST

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, one of the Washington papers, the Washington Times-Herald, carries an editorial, Move the Capital, and proposes that the Capital of the country be moved to some point in the Middle West.

In this connection may I recall the fact that the White House was established and operated in the Black Hills of South Dakota for 3 months in the summer of 1927 and it was operated out there very successfully. I recall a special press conference for the National Editorial Association at which President Coolidge took occasion to comment on how easily he kept in touch with national and international affairs, having that morning dealt with a problem arising at a conference in Switzerland.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. I recall very vividly while the White House was in South Dakota, President Coolidge complied with my request and removed a man by the name of Fenning who was plundering the crazy soldiers in St. Elizabeths Hospital.

Mr. CASE. There is no question but that the Coolidge experience proved that the idea is feasible. There is no question but that a more truly American and representative approach to our problems would result if the seat of government were more nearly in the heart of the country.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to print an article by Frank Kent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an address of the Governor of the State of Arizona.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an article that appeared in the Sunday New York Times.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

(Mr. HOFFMAN asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, because the salesman for Jergens Lotion undoubtedly has forgotten to mention it—he was so busy calling 14,000,000 Americans damn fools last Sunday night that it slipped his mind—I want to read a brief excerpt from the Annual Report of the Federal Trade Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, page 42:

MISREPRESENTING COSMETICS * * *

Jergens-Woodbury Sales Corporation, Cincinnati: This respondent was ordered to cease and desist from representing its face powders and creams to be germicidal while in use or that its face creams and soap have any beneficial effect on the skin by reason of their vitamin content.

It is possible that Jergens-Woodbury Sales Corporation, of Cincinnati, is a different organization than the Andrew Jergens Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, and that the former is just a sales agency for the latter, or that there is no connection between the two, and that one or the other, or perhaps both, will in time disown the New York snooper.

For some time many people have known that, in addition to being a keyhole peeper, a purveyor of ofttimes false, salacious gossip, and of old, shop-worn, so-called news items which he distributed as advance, confidential information, Winchell was, as we used to say, "a mite teched—just a little queer." As a salesman, he certainly distinguished himself last Sunday night, when, as a representative of a Jergens product, he insulted some of that company's customers by calling them damn fools.

Members of Congress who are married should tell their wives, while those who are unmarried should be sure to give to their lady friends the information just quoted from the report of the Federal Trade Commission. The ladies will certainly be interested in learning that a seller of face powders and creams was ordered to desist from misrepresenting its merchandise.

[Here the gavel fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—OPERATIONS UNDER FUNDS APPROPRIATED BY EMERGENCY RELIEF APPROPRIATION ACTS, 1942 AND 1943

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by the provisions of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1943, I present herewith a report of the operations under funds appropriated to the Federal Works Agency, Work Projects Administration, by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts, fiscal years 1942 and 1943, to the end of the calendar year 1942.

This report is supplemental to that portion of the report presented by me to the Congress on January 11, 1943, which is related to operations to the end of the fiscal year 1942 under funds appropriated to the Work Projects Administration by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts of 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, and for fiscal years 1941 and 1942.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 30, 1943.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call, 390 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Further proceedings, under the call, were dispensed with.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1648) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 1648, with Mr. COURTNEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, such time as he may desire.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this is the first of the supply bills. It is the first appropriation bill of the session and of the Congress—the first of a long line of bills appropriating money from the Treasury which it will be necessary for the committee to present to the House for your consideration during the Seventy-eighth Congress.

At this time I wish to express appreciation of the way in which the bill has been handled. I do not believe I have seen an appropriation bill more painstakingly prepared or more ably presented than the one here submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], with the assistance and cooperation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and the ranking members of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. O'NEAL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], in collaboration with the other majority and minority members of the subcommittee. I have no doubt that the chairman will agree that the clerk of the committee, George Harvey, has also borne a share of the burden.

This bill is a legislative milestone. It marks the end of a notable legislative period and the beginning of what promises to be a still more notable period in the fiscal relations of the Nation and the conduct of the war. For that reason, it is appropriate that we pause for an instant at this time and take stock of where we stand; that we make an appraisal of what has been accomplished in the session just closed and outline future objectives.

The Committee on Appropriations has established a unique record. Never before has a committee of the House reported out bills carrying such extraordinary amounts—amounts unequaled in the budgets of the American Congress and unapproached in the records of any parliamentary body in the history of the world. Seldom, if ever, has a committee sat more continuously and through longer hours and may I venture to express the hope, Mr. Chairman, that measured also by the criterion of efficiency its work in the Seventy-seventh Congress also ranks high in the annals of the House.

And lest there be some question on that score, permit me to submit a factual summary based on the ultimate disposition of these appropriations in terms of service and material. Inasmuch as all values are relative, let us take as a yardstick similar accomplishment programs in the last two wars; the Spanish-American War and the First World War. Of merchant ships built in World War No. 1 we supplied a total of 257 units with a combined tonnage of 1,606,000 tons during the period from August 1, 1917, to July 31, 1918, a period of 1 year.

As against that we have built in 1 year of this war a total of 727 units, nearly three times the number in the first year of World War No. 1, and over 8,000,000 tons, which is about five times the tonnage in the first year of the last war. In the total inventory of military airplanes—and that is the weapon upon which this war turns—we produced in World War No. 1 during the entire period of the war a total of 12,000 planes, to be exact, 12,089 planes as against a total of 47,689 planes in the first year of this war.

In machine guns, coming down to the weapon of direct contact, we produced throughout the duration of World War No. 1, 226,000 machine guns, whereas in the first year only of this war we manufactured 670,000 machine guns, about three times the entire production of the First World War over the entire period of its duration. In small-arms ammunition, the vital common denominator in war matériel, we produced 3,500,000,000 rounds in the First World War, and against that item in the first year of the present conflict, 10,250,000,000 rounds. In artillery ammunition we provided in the First World War a total of 18,000,000 rounds, and by way of contrast, in the first year of the present war 181,000,000 rounds. That is a fair measure of production secured in the two wars.

Mr. Chairman, I wish it were possible at this time to put into the RECORD a complete tabulation showing production and delivery of all classes of armament and munitions, but for military reasons we are not permitted to divulge at this time, data indicating the extent of our remarkable progress in preparedness in other branches of the service. Suffice to say that, as compared with the last World War, the results secured in provision for this war more than bear out the ratios already cited.

In taking care of the personnel, there has been corresponding improvement. Whereas in the Spanish-American War there were recurrent scandals incident to the serving of spoiled meat, which will be remembered as the "embalmed meat scandals of 1898," there has been no instance in this war of any complaints either as to the quantity or of the quality of the rations served.

In 1898 we sent our forces into a tropical climate in winter uniforms. In this war, of all the millions of men we have outfitted, for every clime and region ranging from the Arctic Circle down to the Equator, there has been no complaint about the character or suitability of the clothing issued to our men. In the previous war the men were paid $13 a month. In this war we are paying $50 a month. The camps of 1898 fostered disease from yellow fever to dysentery, and, in the First World War, contagions of influenza carried men away by the thousands. There has been no report in this war of any infection or contagion, and the Army and Navy maintain a health rate that even surpasses that of the civilian population. Measured by any criterion, we have prepared for war, more expeditiously, more efficiently, and with less mistakes or maladministration than ever before in the history of American arms. We have inducted more men into the service under better conditions, better fed, better clothed, better housed, better paid, better hospitalized than in any previous war in this country or in any other country.

It is a matter of record. There it stands—a record that cannot be disputed or denied. The war record of the Seventy-seventh Congress, unequaled, unchallenged, unimpeachable, and unassailable.

It is not a partisan record. On the contrary, it is a nonpartisan record, a bipartisan record, an American record. And I want to here make due acknowledgment of the service and participation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the ranking member on the Committee on Appropriations and all minority members of the committee in that record. But for the warm cooperation of the gentleman from New York and his colleagues, their wise counsel, their patriotic collaboration, the task of the committee and the House would have been immeasurably more complicated and infinitely more difficult. It is a record in which all of us on both sides of the aisle may take satisfaction, and one of which every American citizen may be proud. It is a record which has turned the tide of the war. During this first year of the war we have passed through the entire gamut from crushing defeat and disaster on to the way to ultimate success and victory. We have now in every theater of the war passed from the phase of defense to that of attack.

The Seventy-seventh Congress laid the foundation on which the Seventy-eighth Congress will rise to victory.

The military experts of every nation, including Adolf Hitler himself, agreed that the turning point of the war would come in 1942. The Fuehrer announced over the radio to the people of Germany and the Axis Powers that in order to win the war they must win in 1942. Nineteen hundred and forty-two has passed, and they did not win. The year 1942 marked the turning point in our march toward victory. By the 30th day of June we will have completed out of funds provided by the Seventy-seventh Congress practically all of the construction work needed to carry out the war program. By the end of this fiscal year we will have designed, contracted, erected, equipped, tooled, and manned the facilities necessary to produce the matériel and the arms with which to win this war. From now on it is merely a matter of keeping these facilities in efficient operation, in achieving and maintaining peak production in those plants, shops, and factories already provided.

The Seventy-seventh Congress was the war Congress. The Seventy-eighth Congress is the victory Congress. The Seventy-ninth Congress should be the peace Congress; but both the victories of the Seventy-eighth Congress and the enduring peace to be negotiated by the Seventy-ninth Congress would have been impossible without the unparalleled achievements of the Seventy-seventh Congress. Had the Seventy-seventh Congress failed, America would have failed; the world would have failed.

But the war is not over. While victory is in sight, it is yet a long way off. It is still in the far distance, and we face now the most ruinous, gruelling phase of this war, heartbreaking losses, and emergencies in which every effort must be marshaled, every resource utilized. Especially must we husband the Nation's revenues.

While we must continue to provide ample appropriations for military purposes, we must in every way possible reduce nonwar expenditures. Already we have made a record in that respect. Notwithstanding the pressure under which we worked in the last Congress, we were able to cut by more than a billion dollars the nonwar appropriations which would have been made in normal times. Even under the urgent impetus of war, and carrying the heavy burden placed on the committee and on the House, we made record retrenchments. We hope to effect even greater reduction in nonmilitary appropriations in the coming session. In the last Congress under the whip of impending attack it was necessary at times to close our eyes and appropriate for war purposes generously. In many instances we had no choice but to take the recommendations of the Army and the Navy inquiries which involved delay. Money was necessary immediately, and we were not in position to deny it. On such occasions we proceeded on the theory that it was better to appropriate too much, better to be too soon and too generous rather than to run the risk of appropriating too little and providing that little too late. We could not gamble on the outcome. There was too much at stake. The maintenance of the Nation and the preservation of civilization was wavering in the balance. And be it said to the credit of the great Army and Navy leaders on whom we relied, we were never misled. Viewed in retrospect, the appropriations of the Seventy-seventh Congress were more than justified.

But now that the burden of the first phase of the war has been lightened, now that the construction era is passed, and the pressure of the emergency is somewhat relieved, we can return to the established routine of investigating fully before appropriating. We now propose to again scrutinize carefully every proposition to spend. In the bill before you, prepared under the able direction of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], we have scrutinized carefully all appropriations, and especially all nonwar appropriations. We expect to appropriate as accurately as possible, but on war appropriations, if we make any mistake, it still will be to make the mistake of being too generous. But on nonwar appropriations, if we make any mistake, it will be the mistake of cutting too deeply.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I wish the able chairman of the Appropriations Committee would tell us if in the judgment of the committee you will also scrutinize unexpended balances and not vote for so much money that these departments do not even have to come to us but can defy us in the future because they do not need any money, they have plenty already.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman can be assued that the committee examines into the balances on hand when we are considering new money. Also funds are appropriated on a fiscal year basis so that if they are not obligated in that fiscal year they will lapse and cannot be used and must revert to the surplus fund of the Treasury unless they should be reappropriated by action of Congress.

Of course, there are instances in which we have to follow a legislative mandate. There is legislation under which we have no authority except to appropriate; the money is automatically required under the law and we cannot stop it. In the matter of interest on the public debt, for example, that is a permanent appropriation, automatically recurring each year, without annual action by Congress. It is something over which Congress does not exercise any annual review. It would not accomplish anything to do so as the debt is a certain amount and the various interest rates are fixed and bondholders must be paid their interest. In the matter of veterans' benefits the rates are fixed by law and the appropriation automatically fixes itself by the number who qualify.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. The gentleman spoke about retrenchments and cutting down the amount of the appropriations. Will the gentleman tell us, if that is correct, why it is for 1944 there are $1,938,000,000 more appropriated here in this bill than there was for 1943?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The figures to which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MILLER] refers are the permanent appropriations which I have just referred to. The principal amount in the figure he has quoted is increase for interest on the public debt and it is automatic. We exercise no control over the amount. The volume of debt and interest rates govern it.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. The appropriation bill itself.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The amounts to which the gentleman refers are not contained in this bill. They are the so-called automatic appropriations and are printed in this report for information purposes. They have been appropriated by statutes previously enacted and will continue until repealed or modified. They are in the nature of fixed charges and are not subject to much, if any, discretionary determination.

We are not controlled by the Budget estimate. The fact that an estimate has been sent up to us for any amount, or that any amount has been asked for, does not mean we are going to grant it. When these estimates finally pass through the mill of the committee you will find that all surplus water has been squeezed out and all surplus money has been eliminated.

We have had the cooperation of the President. We have been furnished tables showing the amounts impounded by the Executive after the money was provided, where it was found possible under changing conditions to retain some of that money. The President in 1941 and 1942 impounded a vast sum, and we expect him to follow the same plan in the coming Congress.

For example, in the fiscal year 1943, out of every dollar spent by the United States, 94.8 cents goes for war purposes, and only 5.2 cents is for non-war purposes. We expect to continue that course and are outlining that as our policy. We are setting that as our objective. We are going to try to do even better in this Congress.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Are the sums that the President has impounded turned back to the Treasury and do they come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Certainly, at the end of the fiscal year they revert to the Treasury.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. They can be reappropriated only by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. They can be appropriated by the Congress only with the concurrence of the gentleman himself and his colleagues.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, a good many factors are involved in the consideration of this bill. It is not possible to make as large a percentage reduction in the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill as in some of the other bills, but a great many reductions have been made and a great many more should be made.

We found one place where a bureau was afflicted with the same type of governmental employee that constitutes the great bottleneck in the defense effort. Nothing has done more to impede, harass, and slow up the war effort than the presence of so many alleged economists on the Federal pay roll. They are in this bill in the item for expenses of loans, having to do with the promotion of the sale of Government securities. There they are messing things up, there they are holding up progress, there they are doing things that are keeping people from buying bonds and stamps, instead of promoting their sale.

In the Office of Price Administration they are delaying for weeks and weeks decisions on applications made by manufacturers and retailers and farmers as to prices, without having the slightest knowledge about the matters they are holding up. In the War Production Board they are doing the same thing, holding up and delaying the decisions with reference to priorities.

It is up to us just as far as we are able to get rid of those persons who have absolutely no business on the Federal pay roll, who are no asset but instead are a decided, direct, and positive liability to every bit of the war effort.

The other day the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] gave us a long list of people who, he said, are afflicted with communistic or subversive tendencies. Frankly, I have not been able to cover the ground with reference to them so that I would want to say whether or not the charges are correct. I do know that as to those whose records I have been able to cover, I have covered them in one way, and I have failed to find one of them who is performing a real service in the department, the bureau, or the agency to which he is assigned. I think every one of them will be found to be either a drag on the efforts of that bureau or department or totally incompetent and absolutely doing nothing and producing nothing. I know some of them are in that category. No harm would be done to governmental efficiency if every one of them was wiped off the pay roll.

The largest part of that group of so-called economists whose activities come under this bill are covered in the item relating to expenses of loans, are supposed to promote the sales of securities. This item was $13,636,739 for this current year. The way it is set up, after the cut the committee made, it is $9,347,000, and with that they will have more money than they will know what to do with in an efficient and intelligent way.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Are the members of the group to which the gentleman refers just useless in that particular department, or does the gentleman mean that they should not be in the Government service anywhere?

Mr. TABER. Those alleged economists who are on the pay roll and who are holding up the war effort the way they are in the Office of Price Administration, in the War Production Board, and in the sales promotion efforts of the Treasury Department, should not be on the pay roll anywhere. They are totally inefficient and ineffective. They are doing more damage than good. Their only effectiveness is as a bottleneck to prevent things from being done. Sometimes they do things wrong, I will hand them that; but they have no grasp of the economic situation in this country, they have no capacity whatever to perform real service for the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Just one further question. The gentleman recalls that last year the Congress did name certain individuals and provided that none of the money appropriated in a particular bill under discussion should be expended to either pay or compensate them for any service or expenditure, and then those individuals were taken over into other departments.

Mr. TABER. That is true.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is there any way to reach those people no matter where they may be, say, by a general bill providing that no funds appropriated or now on hand should be paid to any of them, naming them?

Mr. TABER. The only way you could keep them off every pay roll would be by limiting the payment in every single appropriation bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Could we not pass a general act?

Mr. TABER. We could, but the President could veto it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But suppose he does?

Mr. TABER. You would not be safe unless you placed an amendment in every appropriation bill and took them off the pay roll as you went along.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But we never could keep up with them.

Mr. TABER. Then they cannot get on any pay roll at all if the amendment is on every bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But they could be put back under the lend-lease or on some money on blank checks.

Mr. TABER. But there will not be any blank checks this year—not enough to carry the derelicts.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HARTLEY. I ask the gentleman's indulgence in order that I may read a letter from a constituent of mine whose name I shall withhold, to demonstrate the confusion and trouble that is being caused by these crackpots who pass themselves off as economists. This letter reads as follows:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HARTLEY: This is a voice crying in the wilderness.

We employ about 60 people and are doing practically 100 percent war work. It is hard for us to determine our own importance but from the requests which we have had from the War Production Board and the Ordnance Department for shipment of materials to the Aluminum Co. of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, respectively, at least some of our products must be essential.

Since the first of this year we have had to complete and file:

SS-1a. Quarterly Federal old-age benefit return.

940. Annual Federal unemployment tax return.

UC-18A. Quarterly State unemployment return.

UC-27B. Quarterly State unemployment return.

WPB-732. Monthly Federal census report.

WPB-1440. Monthly Federal shipment and order report.

WPB-919. Monthly Federal salvage report.

BLS–790. Monthly State volume of employment report.

BLS–1219. Monthly Federal labor turn-over report.

We also have requests to prepare:

WPB–788. Semimonthly Federal machine capacity report.

PD–669. War Production Board notification of machine ordered.

PD–670. War Production Board notice of machine shipped.

PD–25F. War Production Board changes in P. R. P. requirements.

Next month we start on our income-tax return, with its attendant annual information return and report on Form 1099 covering individual earnings. In addition we are acting as collectors for the Victory tax and salesmen and collectors of War bonds.

And now we are working on the reports required by the controlled-materials plan. This is the prize of all the regulations which have been issued by the various governmental bureaus. If ever a Philadelphia lawyer was required to analyze and interpret the phraseology of a document, he is needed to determine the meanings of the rules and regulations covering the operation of the controlled-materials plan.

We in our plant, and I believe in industry generally, are straining every resource to produce whatever is given to us by the various war agencies, and we should devote our energies to production rather than to the preparation of many documents of questionable value. The services of an executive, familiar with the details of a business, are necessary to properly and accurately prepare the requested reports. This works a distinct hardship on a small organization such as our own where we do not have and cannot afford a large corps of highly paid executives.

I realize that certain reports are absolutely necessary for the conduct of the business of government and we cheerfully prepare and forward such reports. But I do request that you use your influence to have the number of required reports reduced, and to have those which are necessary phrased in language which can be understood and interpreted by the average layman.

I think it is high time that we did something about this thing.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman has called attention to one of the worst things that the so-called economists and crackpots pull off. It is one of their ways of getting in the way of the steam roller. They have gotten so far out that the people of this country can see them, and I believe that we are going to have full support of the people in the efforts that we make to get rid of them and get rid of that type of governmental derelict.

Mr. Chairman, there are a good many items in this bill but I am going to refer to only a few of them. Take the item for reimbursement of mortgage interest to the Federal Farm loan bank. That was cut $1,000,000, because it did not figure out that they needed all the money that they asked. Then there is the item for the Farm Loan Corporation, which was cut $800,000 for the same reason. The Foreign Funds Administration in the Treasury was cut $200,000. Frankly, with the advent of the Alien Property Custodian and his taking over a large part of the business end of the business enterprises, that the Foreign Funds control had under their jurisdiction, I do not believe they need so much money. There is too much duplication between the operations of the two units, and I believe that they could take a further cut.

The Tax Research Division which is set up for the first time as a separate unit, was cut $59,810, down to $116,000. That outfit appeared before our committee, and it did not satisfy me that there was anything in the nature of competency. My only check on their capacity has been their appearances before our committee and the Committee on Ways and Means and the Finance Committee of the Senate, besides what they showed before us. Before these committees they told different stories upon several items in connection with the facts. They failed to have any grasp of reports that were filed as to earnings or anything of that kind with the Federal Communications Commission, and their evidence was entirely useless. My information from the Ways and Means Committee people is that they are of very little value. I question if we have not given them too much money.

The Customs Service we cut only $43,900. The earnings of the Customs Service today are down probably to less than one-half of that of last year, and about a third of the year before. That means that they have not anything like the items coming in and going out that they did have. I am getting reports from all over that their activities are nothing like they used to be, and that their help are in such a position that they are unable to find enough to do, and that we might save some money along that line. When we reach that item I expect to take it up.

I call attention to one item in the bill that is rather unusual, and that is the tax-refund item, the customs refund. Tax refunds we appropriated for at the rate of $59,000,000 last year. This year we have to bring in an unlimited amount, whatever is required, to meet the refunds that are required. We have to do that because with the Victory tax and the way it reads, there will be an enormous number of refunds that will have to be made, and it might run even as high as $300,000,000 or $500,000,000 because with the people with small incomes they have a $1,200 exemption in the income tax and only $624 exemption in the Victory tax, and they are entitled to whatever shows and whatever reductions they have on their income beyond that in the nature of taxes, interest, and that sort of thing. So that this item is entirely beyond our control at the present time.

Customs refunds are carried at the same amount they have been, $19,000,000.

There the refunds are required because items come into this country, the duty is paid and the goods go to manufacturers and are made up into products and again exported, and when they are exported the duty is refundable up to a certain percent—I think 99 percent. So that there we have a very large item of refunds on customs that we have not had in days gone by.

In the Post Office Department the only item of any moment that might require explanation is that of post-office inspectors. There we allowed 25 because of the war situation. They have run up since 1925 from 535 to 750 at the present time. There are 175 doing war work, of that increase. With this number they will have at least 100 more than they did have, in addition to those who are doing war work; but with all that number of inspectors, as appears at pages 358 and 359 of the hearings, the number of inspections of post offices has dropped down. We only allow them 25 additional on a temporary basis, and we have said in the report that they must do the main job that they have to do, that is, the inspection of post offices, and get it done.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. Is the gentleman familiar with this pamphlet on Trends in Nonwar Expenditures, issued by the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. TABER. I have seen it. I have not had a chance to read it yet.

Mr. BENDER. I suggest the gentleman read this, because it is a whitewash of these non-defense expenditures. The gentleman knows that the Bureau of the Budget is nothing more or less than an arm of the executive department. This publication was issued for the purpose of throwing sand in the eyes of the country and Members of Congress, and creating the impression that these nonwar expenditures are not nearly as bad as they are made to appear.

Mr. TABER. When we have it from the Budget and the Executive that the W. P. A. has to be wiped out and the money impounded, that the National Youth Administration has to be sneaked into the manpower set-up to cover up its existence, and that the Farm Security Administration is trying to hide under several other aliases, we do not expect that the people of this country will be dumb enough to absorb too much of the apology from the Bureau of the Budget on that subject. We all know that nondefense appropriations have run absolutely wild. We have a lot of them. Every single one of these agencies that has the worst record, is running around trying to take on other activities to cover up their past sins. When they are given other activities they will develop new sins that will be worse than the ones before, because if those people who have such a bad record in the civil activities of the Government once get their fingers into a defense program or a war program set-up, they will run hog wild and there will be absolutely no controlling the operations they indulge in. The only way we can get along with that kind of people is to wipe them out. They do not have any place in government employ.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. While the gentleman is explaining a few of these controversial items I believe he will recall we had this before us in the committee the other day, just why is it necessary to give to the city delivery two and a half million additional over the appropriation for 1943? And the second part of my question, just why is it necessary to add $1,200,000 to the Special Delivery Service above that which we appropriated last year?

Mr. TABER. I will take the special delivery first, because that is easier to answer.

The special-delivery item was cut by the committee a small amount, but the special delivery item is a statutory matter, where the person who makes the delivery is entitled to a specific fee—I think it is 9 cents—on each special-delivery letter delivered. He is entitled to that, regardless of whether we make appropriations or not. The recent increase was allowed because there is an estimated deficiency in the current year. People have been obliged, because of the slowness that has developed in the Postal Service—and I am not criticizing that particularly because the facilities are not available to make it any better—people have been obliged to put special-delivery stamps upon a great many letters that they did not before. Because there have been so many issued and sold and so many more special delivery letters, the fees have piled up, and there will be a deficiency of all of that increase for this year.

Now, on the letter carrier proposition, the same situation applies. The city letter carriers are required to carry a great deal more mail. The volume of mail has gone up terrifically. I could show you from some papers I have on the table items that have been sent out by the promotion activities of the Government—great big, thick, heavy packages. It is estimated for 1944, unless we do something about it, that the cost of handling the penalty or free mail will run upward of $82,000,000. That is a fair sample of the way these things are going up, and that is one of the reasons why we are getting such a big increase.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I bring up this question because while we acknowledge a great increase in mail, immediately following these two particular items you will note $92,200,000 for rural route carriers. Of course, that great increase of mail should apply to the country. God knows we have had plenty of literature going out to the country. My point is if we give any increase at all for city delivery why is not some consideration given toward increasing the load on the rural route carriers?

Mr. TABER. The statement was made to us, as I remember it—I may be wrong, but the statement was made that there had been an allowance for all the most meritorious cases for extension of rural delivery routes provided here in this bill, a continuance of the allotment for new service in the Rural Free Delivery, and it is just as much as it was in the last 4 or 5 years. They are going to be able to spend probably double the amount that was set up in our bill of last year for extensions of Rural Free Delivery Service. I think we have a provision for a couple of hundred thousand dollars for those extensions, and I think they are going to spend at least $400,000 in this current fiscal year. They are effecting some savings on the operation of rural routes due to consolidations and an occasional discontinuance, but there have not been many discontinuances.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. One further question in conclusion, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I am not criticizing what the gentleman has to say; fundamentally it is correct, but there comes to my mind an instance on my own home route. I am one of the few Members of Congress who live on a rural route, and this route is back in Minnesota. I have been refused by the Post Office Department consideration of four short extensions which would bring to these 12 neighbors of mine the opportunity not to have to travel three-quarters of a mile through knee-deep snow to get their mail. I feel, consequently, especially when I think of our apartment down here in Washington where they have cut city delivery to once a day that perhaps this $2,500,000 extra comes under the heading of nonessentials.

Mr. TABER. I can see why the gentleman feels as he does, but I do not think the items the gentleman refers to should have been denied; I think they should have been granted; I think they are in a position where, if the roads are so the carriers can get through, there is no question but what on meritorious matters they should give these rural route extensions.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CASE. Coming back to the first question, that in regard to special delivery, did I understand the gentleman to say that the increase in special-delivery mail is such that the increased revenue resulting from the sale of special-delivery stamps offsets the increased appropriation?

Mr. TABER. There is no payment out of this appropriation for the delivery of special-delivery letters except 9 cents on each letter—and the special-delivery stamp costs 10 cents; so there is 1 more cent going into the general pool of the Post Office Department or to the Treasury out of the sale of each special-delivery stamp. I will say that I have to use special-delivery stamps on my own letters if I want to get them to my home town in 1 day. I can get 2-day service by regular mail, but for 1-day service, I have to use a special-delivery stamp.

Mr. CASE. And for this $1,800,000 the Treasury will collect $2,000,000?

Mr. TABER. On $800,000, the Treasury will collect $900,000, the appropriation is $12,200,000, and the Treasury will collect about $13,500,000.

Let me say that I believe the committee has done as well as it could with this bill in every way, everything considered. There are some things upon which we did not agree entirely and some things that may have to be worked out here on the floor. There are a lot of problems. We probably have not discovered everything that might have been discovered in connection with this bill—one never does—but I may say that we have had complete, full hearings and have been permitted to go just as far as we wished. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], chairman of the committee, has been very gracious and has done the best he could to cut down appropriation and still allow funds to operate. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. O'NEAL] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] sat at all the hearings of the committee and were very helpful. I appreciate very much the work of my two associates, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], have done upon the bill. I hope the Committee of the Whole, if it does anything to the bill, will improve it before we report it back to the House.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JONKMAN].

THE "FOUR FREEDOMS"

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Chairman, in the last 10 years many strange doctrines and ideologies in derogation of our national Constitution have been practiced on the American people. From a republican form of government we have been gyrating to a government by bureaucrats, to a concentration of power in the administration which closely approaches a dictatorship and has greatly curtailed and restricted constitutional American freedom.

Since we have been in the war this has been greatly intensified; and not only that, but those of the American people who are most zealous in the protection of constitutional American liberty, have practically disarmed themselves, in their willingness to concentrate in the bureaucratic administration, at the risk of their liberty, all governmental power that is necessary to win the war. And yet, even in wartime, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and while it is our duty to delegate to the administration all powers necessary to the winning of the war, it is equally our duty to resist the ideologies and usurpation of power which are foreign to both the war effort and our form of government.

One trend in this subversive movement has become very popular in the last year or more. Last Monday's newspapers reported speeches on it and it is the constant subject of radio commentators and others. This is the slogan that we are fighting for the "four freedoms" of the Atlantic Charter, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from want, and freedom from fear.

Administration leaders and bureaucrats adroitly use this slogan, or parts of it, as the panacea for the ills of the people of the United States or the peoples of the world, depending on the occasion.

A more insidious and dangerous ideology and propaganda could scarcely be invented or disseminated.

That document signed on August 14, 1941, somewhere in the Atlantic by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, was not and did not purport to be a charter of rights, but a statement of peace aims.

A charter is a grant of special rights from an absolute and sovereign monarch, from a dictator to his subjects. It is confined to rights and privileges granted in the charter and by implication excludes all rights and freedoms not so granted.

Such a charter, as we know, was granted by King John to the English people in 1215 and was known as Magna Carta, or the Great Charter. It marked the beginning of constitutional government. Under it Englishmen were for the first time entitled to certain rights in spite of a totalitarian monarch, such as trial by jury, a voice in tax matters, and certain other specified privileges. So there have been charters granted by the sovereign power to cities, colonies, and similar bodies politic.

I do not believe that either President Roosevelt or Prime Minister Churchill ever referred to that document as a charter, and certainly they both know that they are the servants, not the sovereigns, of their respective peoples, and, as such, cannot make a grant of any rights whatsoever.

In the second place that document stating the peace aims of the respective representatives of Britain and the United States says nothing about the "four freedoms" as such. The only reference to freedoms in that document is contained in the sixth peace aim, which reads:

> After the final destruction of Nazi tyranny they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

Obviously the fear and want referred to in this sixth peace aim is the fear and want caused by war, and the threat of war by the wanton attack, looting, raping, and murder of greedy aggressor nations such as has been suffered by the vanquished and stricken peoples of Europe and suffered to a greater or lesser degree by all depending nations from gangster peoples. Not by the remotest stretch of imagination can this be construed as a guaranty to the people of our Nation, or any other nation, as freedom from want and freedom from fear as a socialistic scheme of internal economy. And, mark you, freedom of religion and freedom of speech were in no wise mentioned in that document.

In the third place those so-called "four freedoms" are not freedoms in any sense unless accompanied and vitalized by a fifth and it should be the first and fundamental freedom, and that is economic freedom. Now remember that a charter is a grant of special rights and freedoms and excludes any right or freedom not expressly granted. And, therefore, as I said before, those "four freedoms" are not freedoms at all, or, if I may speak paradoxically, they are the freedoms of the slave.

Imagine, if you will, a slave before the days of the Civil War. His master, his owner, his dictator, had, or at least should have, no objection to allowing the slave freedom of speech or freedom of religion. He could have any religion or superstition he wished, he could talk or prattle to his heart's desire, provided, however, and with the always present limitation, that he must never indulge in those freedoms to the extent of saying or claiming that he was made in God's image and therefore the political equal of his master. He must never indulge in the concept of free speech and religious freedom to the extent of claiming that he was entitled to enjoy the fruits of his own labor, to come and go as he pleased or that he was entitled to a wife and family of his own. No, indeed; those and similar rights constituting economic freedom were denied that slave and in place of them the slaveholder guaranteed him freedom from want and freedom from fear just as he extended these to his other chattels, his cattle. I say to you, my friends, the so-called "four freedoms" of the Atlantic Charter are a myth and a snare to shackle the unwary, the bait for which is greatly extended social security, and unless the American people are vigilant the bureaucrats will have the shackles riveted on their limbs before they realize it. For these "four freedoms" are exactly the freedoms of the slaves of totalitarian states.

Mr. Chairman, the liberty of Americans is not confined to the "four freedoms" and finds its source not in a charter granted by a prime minister, a president, or a potentate, or bureaucrat. The foundation of American freedoms is found in the Declaration of Independence, in these words:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

The guaranty, the security of these rights, rests, not in a charter, but on a compact between freemen, the preamble of which reads:

> We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

These are the rocks upon which our temple of liberty, with its tripartite form of government, and its Bill of Rights, has rested securely for a century and a half. We are not restricted to a charter or "four freedoms," but to the enjoyment of all freedom by every individual inherently, restricted only by the requirements of a like freedom in every other individual.

And do not think when I call attention to the vice and danger in that ideology and propaganda of the so-called "four freedoms" of the Atlantic Charter, I am dealing only in remote and future danger.

The gyves are already on our ankles. The ground has already been broken in an assault on the Bill of Rights and the frittering away of religious freedom.

A little over a year ago a case was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States involving a claimed right under the Bill of Rights, and a religious freedom guaranteed thereunder. Unquestionably the sect which claimed this right had very narrow views. And the Supreme Court in an 8 to 1 decision held that their views were too narrow; that they were not entitled to what they claimed as religious freedom under the Bill of Rights.

But on June 8 of last year the same sect was again before the Supreme Court on another phase of their religion, which they claimed as guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. Again they were convicted, but this time only by a 5-to-4 decision. But—and this is the point I want to emphasize—three of the four dissenters frankly confessed, "We helped make the law in the first case, but we now believe that that case was wrongly decided." However that may be, both cases are now the law of the land, and, according to four judges—three of them repentant—for the first time in over a hundred and fifty years we have taken two steps on the road away from the religious liberty guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. As Chief Justice Stone, in his dissenting opinion, said in substance, we are adopting tactics better adapted to the effective suppression of speech and press and religion, despite constitutional guaranties, than those which were a moving cause of the American Revolution.

There is now pending in the Federal courts a prosecution by the Department of Justice against the Associated Press, which is a free association of a free press to gather news for its members. In this prosecution the New Deal administration is seeking to destroy the freedom of the Associated Press and make it subject to Government domination and control, just as it dominates our railroads and other common carriers. This is, of course, seeking another step in the same direction.

These trends and ideologies have no bearing on and make no contribution to the war effort but are purely a quest for concentration of power by the bureaucrats bent on making over our Government. They should, however, offer a touchstone by which we may test the genuineness of many of the absolute powers sought by the administration under the guise of war powers. A constantly increasing number of the people are becoming awake to these trends and dangers, and there can be no question but that the last election constituted a mandate to the Congress to beware of foreign freedoms and especially the "four freedoms" of the Atlantic Charter and similar ideologies.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair kindly inform me how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has 36 minutes remaining; the gentleman from New York has 1 hour and 18 minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] 30 minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Mr. Chairman, for the past 2 years the shortage of gasoline and fuel oil on the North Atlantic seaboard has been an acute fact.

The annual consumption in that section was normally about 1,600,000 barrels per day. Before the submarine menace, the ocean tankers supplied more than 95 percent of that consumption. Under present conditions the tankers are eliminated entirely, and inland transportation of various types have been resorted to, all of which has been inadequate for the emergency. Railways, inland waterways, highways, and pipe lines have been brought into service, but all combined can only transport about 60 percent of the normal needs.

To supply the necessary transportation facilities for the movement of these essential commodities involves enormous expenditures of money, and the conversion of vast amounts of critical materials badly needed in the war effort. It also involves delays, the consequences of which cannot be foreseen.

The major portion of the shipments are now by rail but the roads were poorly equipped for the burden. Owing to the fact that rail transportation of petroleum and its products is too costly to compete with pipe lines and waterways, the roads have heretofore refrained from making large investments in equipment for handling such commodities. The tank cars now in use are practically all owned by the oil companies, and for the use of which the roads are paying a rental.

I am not advised as to the number of tank railroad cars now engaged in the movement of petroleum to the East. According to the report of the Temporary National Emergency Committee of the hearings held in 1939, as published by the American Petroleum Institute, there were then 141,949 railroad tank cars in existence, 130,985 of which were owned by oil companies. I am advised that many of these cars are old and in bad order, and some of them impracticable for use. Their capacity was said to be 8,000 gallons, or more, each, or about 191 barrels per car.

Mr. J. J. Pelley, president of the Association of American Railroads, stated before a Senate committee on January 27 that the railroads were hauling an average of 770,000 barrels per day, and he expected that to be increased to 900,000 barrels. In addition to tank cars in use, they had borrowed 200,000 drums from the Army, and expected to get 500,000 additional drums, with capacity of about 600,000 barrels. These drums, filled with oil, were being hauled in box cars. Mr. Pelley also stated that he had asked the War Production Board for 878 new locomotives, in addition to the 1,000 requested the year before, but did not expect his request to be granted for more than 600 additional locomotives.

A 24-inch pipe line has just been completed from east Texas to a point in southern Illinois, and its extension to the eastern seaboard has been authorized. Its general course is to parallel the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. When completed, it will have a capacity of 250,000 to 300,000 barrels of oil per day. It is expected to have it in operation in time to furnish fuel oil to New England for the fall season of 1943. Its cost is estimated at $95,000,000, and 355,000 tons of steel will be required for its completion. Work was commenced sometime last summer. The course of this pipe line is several hundred miles longer than it would have been to have taken a more direct route. This, of course, adds to the cost of construction and operation, and adds enormously to the amount of necessary war materials involved.

If, instead of paralleling the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, the pipe line had first been laid from the Ohio to the eastern seaboard, the delivery of 300,000 barrels of fuel oil per day to New England could easily have been now in operation. The necessary wooden barges and tow boats for operation on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers could have been built in the same time the pipe line was being laid; the cost would have been far less than the cost of the transcontinental pipe line, and it could have been in operation for the present winter season.

We have a splendid intracoastal channel from Corpus Christi, Tex., to Trenton, N. J., with the exception of a 92-mile missing link across Florida, from the Gulf to the St. John River. This channel across Florida has been authorized by Congress, but opposing interests may be successful in delaying the construction indefinitely. For temporary use Congress also authorized the laying of a pipe line across Florida, but those in charge have only provided an 8-inch pipe to serve local needs.

We have heard a great deal of praise for the railroads for the part they have performed in moving oil and gasoline to the East. It is true, they have done a great work, and have accomplished much more than their operators themselves at first thought possible. They have also succeeded in moving many millions of tons of other war materials for which they have received no public acclamation, though the accomplishment was equally meritorious.

In transporting oil and gasoline, the railroads have done what they were employed to do, and for which they have received the regular compensation. In view of the fact that the cost of this transportation is approximately nine times greater than it would have been by water, this increased cost had to be met.

Such costs are usually paid by the consumers, but in this case the consumers have been relieved of that burden and rightfully so as I believe. They were in nowise responsible for the conditions that brought it about. The oil shippers pay to the railroads the regular rail charges for transportation. The differences between those charges and the water costs are refunded to them by the Government acting through the Defense Supplies Corporation.

The oil shippers, as I am advised, submit their claims for reimbursement to this corporation. Upon examination 75 percent of the claim is paid by check, and 25 percent withheld for more complete audit. The amounts paid for the month of December totaled, as I am advised, $15,666,000, representing 75 percent of the claims presented. When the other 25 percent is paid it will be seen that the Government is actually paying more than $700,000 per day on account of the oil shipments by rail.

When these oil shipments by rail are enormously increased as outlined by Mr. Pelley, the refunds will be correspondingly increased. An editorial in the Houston Post of January 28 calls attention to the fact that boxcars loaded with drums of oil as contemplated carry only 6,545 gallons whereas the tank cars carry 7,000 gallons or more. The editorial states that a Houston shipper had called attention to the fact that shipping drums of oil in boxcars would entail considerable extra cost which would be borne by the Government.

As will be seen from the refund payments made to the oil shippers for the month of December the Government is actually paying more than $250,000,000 annually on account of having those shipments go by rail. When the rail shipments are increased to 900,000 barrels per day, as the program now contemplates, and as stated by Mr. Pelley, then these refunds will be increased to approximately $400,000,000 annually. This extra cost can be eliminated in a comparatively short time if Congress will, without delay, construct the barge channel across Florida. If Congress should fail to construct this channel, this enormous burden will be upon the taxpayers for an indefinite period.

The cost of the canal is estimated at $44,000,000. The cost of 2,286 wooden barges and 1,143 steel barges, together with the cost of 1,170 tugboats, will amount to $260,550,000. This is the equipment estimated by engineers as necessary for the movement of 900,000 barrels of oil and gasoline per day from Texas to the northeastern area. The cost of this equipment is estimated at $40,000 each for the wooden barges, $60,000 each for the steel barges, and $95,000 for the tugboats.

These estimates are not of my own making. They have been prepared for me by very competent engineers. They will show conclusively that for each dollar in cost of equipment and each ton of steel used, the barge system will transport more petroleum than any other known system of transportation.

Petroleum and its products constitute one of the most essential commodities of this Nation in both war- and peacetime. Before the war it constituted slightly more than 50 percent of our traffic upon the high seas. I am advised by high authority that it now constitutes approximately 70 percent of the supplies going to our Armies and Navy overseas. Yet our internal transportation system is such that a few German submarines on the Atlantic Ocean have been able to almost completely paralyze this most essential industry. It is all due to a few missing links in our transportation system which can easily be eliminated. Just how long the American people will continue to permit such conditions to exist remains to be seen.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I want to compliment the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for the fine work he has done in regard to the development of our inland waterways and our harbor facilities. I note what he says in regard to the necessity for building this canal at the earliest possible time in order to provide fuel oil facilities for New England. I was told today that during the next 5 or 6 weeks—and this comes to me from a high authority in charge of our distribution program—the people of New England are going to suffer a good deal of hardship and privation during the next 5 weeks because they cannot get fuel oil. In line with the suggestions heretofore made, the gentleman has suggested this barge canal. We from New England have followed that suggestion during a long period of time and every one of us voted for the original authorization, as I understand it; but there seems to be a great conflict of opinion as to when this canal can be finished. We were told on the floor of the House yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO], of the gentleman's own committee, that the Chief of Engineers says it will take 3 years. We were told by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] yesterday that he has it on reliable authority that it can be finished in less than a year and if necessary he can get from the War Department engineers an estimate of completion that it will take less than a year.

What has the chairman of the committee to say in regard to the possible time that it can be finished, through which barges can operate to bring fuel oil to the New England area?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I may say that the estimates vary from 8 months to 3 years. The Chief of Engineers states that in accordance with the usual procedure of securing appropriations from time to time, and in view of the fact that priorities have to be given for war materials, he estimates it will probably be 3 years before this barge canal can be completed. The head of the Arundel Corporation of Baltimore, perhaps the highest authority in this country on matters of this kind, a company that has done more work of this nature than any other concern in the United States or any place else, tells me that they can do it with the machines they have within 10 months. General Summerall, ex-Chief of Staff of the United States Army, a gentleman of great ability who succeeded General Pershing in that position, I believe, a graduate of West Point, and an engineer of great distinction, tells me he has from prominent contractors the highest assurance that it can be constructed in less than 1 year with the machinery that may be made available. It is all a question of machinery.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. With the information the gentleman has, does it appear to him that the Chief of Engineers is not taking that source of information as authentic or reliable?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. The Chief of Engineers is a very careful man and very able man. He estimates, according to the way Congress usually appropriates the money for these purposes, that it will string out through a period of years and he takes that into contemplation when making his estimates. They invariably do that.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Has the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors ever suggested to the Chief of Engineers, or asked him if the Congress should immediately appropriate the forty or fifty million dollars required, how long it would take him to complete that job? What is his answer to that?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I have not conversed with him along that line.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. So that the original estimate of completion date so far as the Chief of Engineers is concerned, is 3 years?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. That was the Chief of Engineers, yes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. He has not changed his opinion from that time to this?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That will not help us very well in New England.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. No, but this bill provides for a pipe-line across there. They could have put a pipe-line across there, about 195 miles, that would be conveying oil to New England today, instead of building a 2,000-mile pipe-line, clear across the continent.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. What would the capacity of that pipe-line be?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. It depends on the size and it depends on the pressure. If they put in the same size as they put in from Texas up to Illinois it would convey from 250,000 to 300,000 barrels a day.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. We do not care how we get oil up to New England. They are desperate for oil in order to keep warm and there is a great deal of suffering. If this barge line is going to take 3 years to build, as the Chief of Engineers says, it will not be of any value to us. If it can be built in a year's time, it will be of value.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GREEN. I asked the Chief of Engineers the other day if it could not be built in 2 years and he said yes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Why does not the gentleman get a statement from the Chief of Engineers and put it in the RECORD showing just what he does say, so there will be some incentive for us in New England to give consideration to it?

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not possible for this canal to be used for the transportation of oil before all the locks and things are completed?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. The bill provides for temporary works. They can build those locks for temporary use and they will serve for a period of many years.

Mr. WHITE. That would greatly shorten the period?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes and it would eliminate the steel that is necessary for the war program.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would like to ask the gentleman two very brief questions and I will let him answer. Is it not true that General Reybold, in his testimony on this canal, said that it is an emergency and should be started at once? Did that not appear in the record of the hearings?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I think so; yes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yesterday the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO], spoke on this and he said that if we were going to have a canal, that there is already an existing canal in the State of Florida. I have always voted for the improvement of our waterways down there and for that existing canal that he speaks of, extending from Fort Myers to Stewart. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas, what are the possibilities of providing this canal in lower Florida to get oil to the eastern seaboard?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. It would probably be 10 to 20 years before a canal could be constructed there that would be practical, and after you had it there is no approach to it from the west coast, or from the Gulf coast, except by tankers. That would not be an inland route and it would not be safe.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They would be subject to submarine attack?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes. Submarines have been sinking ships in the Gulf within 4 miles of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The channel across there was adopted on a survey ordered in a bill from the Committee on Flood Control. If you recall, 15 or 18 years ago there was a terrible hurricane that blew the water out of Lake Okeechobee, killed several hundred people west of there and destroyed a great deal of property, and then went off into the Everglades. This was started as a flood-control project. The main part of the authorization and of the cost was for levees around Lake Okeechobee. Then we amended the bill so as to make a navigation channel there, but it is only 6 feet deep and 80 feet wide. It would cost many, many millions of dollars to make a practical channel of it, 125 feet wide and 12 feet deep, to correspond with the other. It runs through Lake Okeechobee and over to Stuart near the east coast, and from there up to Jacksonville there is a channel that is only 8 feet deep and 100 feet wide.

On that project you would have to order surveys and investigations and have hearings and all that through a long period of years, and then decide sometime in the future whether or not this would make a practical navigation channel and would be justified. It is 543 miles longer than the channel adopted by Congress. It would be 600 miles farther to go to the east, even if you had a channel all around, than the channel that has been recommended by the engineers.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman tell the committee what is the maximum amount of the annual subsidy now going to the railroads under the present arrangement?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. The oil shippers are paying the railroads just their regular rates. The railroads cannot very well afford to haul it any cheaper. I am not blaming the railroads, for they have done a great work and are doing all they can, but that is the condition. They cannot haul it for any less. The cheapest they can afford to haul it for is nine times or eight and two-thirds times the cost of shipping the oil this way.

Mr. CULKIN. What is the estimated maximum amount of the subsidy?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. It depends on how much oil they transport.

Mr. CULKIN. At the present and probable rate of transportation, as estimated by Mr. Pelley, it is approximately $400,000,000 a year.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I made that estimate on the supposition that it will be increased to 900,000 barrels, as he says. It is only about 700,000 barrels a day at the present time.

Mr. CULKIN. Is the gentleman sanguine about getting a bill through that will eliminate that subsidy?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. The bill has already been passed by Congress, but the money has not been appropriated.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman realizes the forces that are at work against that project, representing the railroads?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes; I understand all that. I have had no misapprehension about that for 20 years.

Mr. CULKIN. They have spent some $31,000,000 last year for advertising and probably $100,000,000 for lawyers. I do not like to indict my own cult, but the lawyers got a great killing on that. Does the gentleman think he can overcome that?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. You cannot blame the railroad lawyers. I used to be one myself.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say to the gentleman that I believe the statement the gentleman has made is a definite challenge to the Congress. It should remember that good Americans are freezing to death in the Northeast.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. A year ago last September I wrote to Mr. Pelley suggesting that he use two railroads down there to transport this oil across Florida. One of them was 240 miles in length and the other was 317 miles in length. Engineers informed me that those two roads could easily transport 200,000 barrels of oil a day. Mr. Pelley did not take to the proposition. He wanted to haul the oil clear across the continent, and said it would make no problem for the railroads. He sent me a copy of his testimony before a Senate committee given that same day, in which he took that view. He did not seem favorable to the short haul across Florida.

You can take these railroad cars on that short haul and see the difference in hauling oil 200 miles as against 2,000 miles from Texas to Boston. Those cars go up there and then go back empty. They cannot go under burden both ways. You have to count the round trip in computing the time. It is the same way with the barges, although the barges could have return cargoes on their decks.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. The bill authorizing the construction of the Florida barge canal became law at the last session of Congress?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes; last summer.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman tell us what, in his opinion, is holding it up? Is not an authorization by the Congress usually considered by the Committee on Appropriations to be a mandate?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. The Committee on Appropriations has not made any appropriation since that time for the civil functions of the War Department. These appropriations usually come in the War Department civil functions appropriation bill, and those appropriations are made in the spring. This bill was passed last summer, and there has not yet been considered a civil-functions appropriation bill.

Mr. MOTT. Then the Committee on Appropriations has not had an opportunity to pass on this question?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. It has not had an opportunity to do so; no.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. In the address of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] yesterday he made the statement that he did not want to embarrass any engineer or anyone else in the War Department, but that he could get an opinion from the War Department that this canal can be constructed and have barges going through it within the period of a year. This discussion has been going on for a year. We are very much interested in this project, and I should like to know about it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I wonder if the gentleman from Florida has ever asked anybody in the War Department for such an opinion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to answer that question?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HENDRICKS. May I say to the gentleman that yesterday I said that I did not want to embarrass anyone in the War Department, but I said that I could get an opinion from someone in the War Department. I want to say this, and I cannot name the engineer, but he has given his opinion, one of the engineers, that this can be done in 10 months.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Why should not the Chief Engineer acquiesce in that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes; if I have the time.

Mr. GREEN. For only one observation, as to the time element. This contracting concern is a strong reliable concern and they say that they will enter into a contract and guarantee to build it within that time.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BENDER. Has not this Florida ship canal been before us for a good many years?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. The Florida ship canal is not before us now.

Mr. BENDER. Is not this just window dressing for that project?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. It is not, if the gentleman will take my word for it.

Mr. BENDER. How much money has been spent in the last decade for river and harbor improvements?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. I can answer that in the RECORD. I have not the figures now, but if the gentleman desires I shall put them in the RECORD.

Mr. BENDER. And this is for civilian functions?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BENDER. It is not an emergency war matter or appropriation?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Oh, that is up to the Congress. It is nothing to me whether they appropriate the money or not. I am not as much interested as dozens of others.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Can the priorities for the steel be secured? As I understand it everything is all ready for the pipe line.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Everything. There will be very little steel used if they use temporary material.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. So it will be an economical unit?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes. At one time they used nothing but wooden locks, but, of course, steel is better, but in an emergency we do many things that are not the best.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They are taking additional oil and kerosene away from us in New England.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining time I have, 3½ minutes, to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, when we reach the reading of the Post Office and Treasury appropriation bill, under the 5-minute rule, I propose to offer an amendment on page 12, line 22, as follows:

Page 12, line 22, after the word "Treasury" strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of William Pickens, Frederick L. Schuman, Goodwin B. Watson, William E. Dodd, Jr., Paul R. Porter, John Herling, Paul F. Brissenden, David J. Saposs, Maurice Parmelee, Harold Loeb, Sam Schmerler, Emil Jack Lever, David Lasser, Tom Tippett, Henry C. Alsberg, David Karr, Guiseppi Facci, David Wahl, Hugh Miller, Walter Gellhorn, Karl Borders, Jack Fahy, Nathaniel Weyl, Robert Morss Lovett, Merle Vincent, Alice Barrows, Arthur F. Goldschmidt, Marcus I. Goldman, Leonard Emil Mins, Henry T. Hunt, Mary McLeod Bethune, Harry C. Lamberton, T. A. Bisson, Katherine Kellock, Jay Deiss, Milton V. Freeman, George Slaff, A. C. Shire, and Edward Scheunemann."

This amendment is a bit unusual in that it includes William Pickens, who would be directly affected by this bill, and a list of the names of other people who would be affected later and this is the reason that I wanted to give the House notice that I was offering this amendment.

You may well ask why I include the other names in the amendment if William Pickens is the only man who would be directly affected by this bill under the present circumstances, and I want to explain the reason. The reason is to prevent hedge hopping. When we were working on the W. P. A. bill in 1941, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] offered an amendment which was adopted by the House and retained by the Senate and was enacted into law. The amendment provided—

That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of David Lasser.

As I said, the amendment was adopted and I want to ask you where do you think Mr. Lasser is at this moment? Mr. Lasser has now been employed by the War Production Board as senior economist, and with an increase in salary. When he was eliminated from this appropriation bill he was receiving $4,400 a year. He is now receving $4,600 a year. And Mr. Lasser's case is not the only one. I want to cite some other cases in which hedge-hopping has been done. In other words, when one of these gentlemen has been reported as having views not healthy to our form of government and has been discharged from one branch of the Government he just hedgehops into another branch. On March 28, 1942, the gentleman from Texas, Chairman DIES, wrote a letter to Hon. HENRY WALLACE, Chairman of the Board of Economic Warfare, calling his attention to the Communist affiliations of eight of his employees, and made particular reference to one Maurice Parmelee, principal economist of the B. E. W., at a salary of $5,600 a year. Mr. Parmelee had written several books advocating the practice of nudism in America. Two days later Parmelee was dismissed from the B. E. W. He was reemployed, however, on November 2, 1942, at the Railroad Retirement Board as an economist at $4,600 a year.

In 1938, David J. Saposs, chief economist of the National Labor Relations Board, was exposed by the Dies committee, and in 1939 by the Smith committee, investigating the N. L. R. B. As a result of these exposures David J. Saposs was dismissed from the N. L. R. B. He was later reemployed as an economist in the office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, and just recently appointed assistant to the chief of the labor division of the War Production Board at a salary of $8,000 per year.

In 1938, Henry G. Alsberg was director of the Federal writers project of the W. P. A. This project was exposed by the Dies committee as being a tool of Communist propaganda, and in 1939 the House abolished the agency, which automatically removed Alsberg from the Federal pay roll. Alsberg has recently been reemployed by the Federal Government and is now senior feature writer in the Office of War Information at $4,600.

In 1935 Sam Schmerler was dismissed from the F. B. I. on account of his Communist activities. Several weeks later he was employed by the Social Security Board, and has worked there ever since. At present he is employed as a policy consultant at a salary of $3,800 a year.

In 1941 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], in a letter to the President, exposed the Communist affiliations of Emil Jack Lever, then employed in O. E. M. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] was never advised as to what action was taken against Lever; however, he is now employed as head labor adviser in the War Production Board at $6,500.

In the debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] said, in effect, "It is time that we indicate to the heads of the departments that we are not going to stand for these men being employed in the Government." But you will see it makes no difference what indication we give—that they will get around it some way—because Mr. Lasser is still on the pay roll.

I have heard leading Members of this House say that they believe action ought to be taken, but this is not the proper way to take it. Well, I want to disagree heartily. Any other measure that we may pass could be considered by the courts as an infringement upon the powers and prerogatives of the executive branch but an appropriation bill originates in the House of Representatives, and the House is entitled to put any limitation that they so desire on these appropriations.

The list of the names that I have included in this amendment are the ones which were given to us last Monday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who is chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities. If this amendment is adopted certainly none of these people can hedgehop from any other department to the department for which this appropriation is made.

If this amendment is adopted, I propose to offer the same amendment, including the same names, to every appropriation bill, large or small, which comes before the House of Representatives in the future, and if the amendment is adopted we will know then that none of these men can hedge hop from one department into the other because they will be eliminated from all appropriations.

The time has come when the Members of this House should decide whether we do or whether we do not. In 1938, I believe it was, this House created by legislative action the committee known as the Committee on Un-American Activities, and from that time until the present that committee has spent $470,000, and I find now that there is a resolution for the continuation of this committee for another 2 years, and that the committee will no doubt ask for $75,000 more to continue their work, which will make a sum total of $545,000, or over a half-million dollars. We should either decide that we are going to accept the responsibility thrown upon us by this special committee when they submit these names to us as having improper views concerning our form of government and eliminate them from the appropriation bills, or we should decide that the committee is serving no purpose and cease to make further appropriations. The amendment which I shall offer when we come to the reading of this bill under the 5-minute rule will give every Member of this House the opportunity to decide that one thing. I sincerely request that every Member give this his careful consideration. If there is any other way to have these undesirables eliminated from the pay roll, certainly I shall be glad to know of that way, but up to the present time no one has suggested a method other than this, and under these circumstances I believe this is the only way and that the amendment should be adopted.

I propose to discuss the records of the people mentioned in this amendment at the proper time so that Members of the House will be able to determine themselves whether or not they are the people we desire on the pay roll of the Federal Government.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD. There are some things I did not have time to state.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK].

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Chairman, I deem it a privilege to be able to serve on the Committee on Appropriations, and particularly this subcommittee, because of the opportunity it gives to serve with those distinguished members who have given years of service to the supply bills for the Treasury and Post Office Departments.

Unfortunately for me, the hearings began early in December, prior to my assignment to this committee, so that I did not have an opportunity to listen to those hearings, to the various witnesses, and to the justifications which were presented during the hearings, which continued for about 6 weeks. Consequently,

I am not qualified at this time to give you any specific information dealing with this particular bill, but I shall take a few minutes to present to you a few of the observations which I have made as a Member of this body prior to my assignment to this committee and which have been confirmed to some extent during the past few weeks while helping to write up this particular supply bill.

This observation is that ordinarily the Budget as submitted, as was pointed out a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER], is more or less considered sacrosanct. Those estimates come up from the executive department and then hearings are held. Witnesses are called to justify those requests for funds. Ordinarily it is difficult for members of the Appropriations Committee to be well informed on those requests, so that they may act intelligently thereon.

Recently the distinguished chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], submitted a resolution providing that personnel be made available for the committee so that help might be employed to investigate those requests which are submitted by the Bureau of the Budget, so that when the supply bills are submitted to this body for final consideration and action we shall know definitely that there has been no unnecessary duplication and unnecessary waste and extravagance which might well be eliminated.

Our committee chairman about an hour ago eulogized the Seventy-seventh Congress as the War Congress because of the gigantic sums which had been appropriated and made available to the executive departments with which to administer the various aspects of our war program. I am in accord with the statement made by the distinguished chairman, because I believe the Congress is not only providing ample funds but probably a surplus or excess of funds, for the use of the various executive departments. It is true that we cannot stint in our efforts in any way in making available funds for the War Department and the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission, and for that matter other bureaus and agencies dealing directly with the war effort. Yet I wonder if this body has considered whether or not those executive departments have done the same kind of an efficient job in expending those huge appropriations which are approved by Congress. We hear many criticisms, and there is a Nation-wide demand for greater efficiency and more economy, not only in our nonwar expenditures but likewise in our war expenditures, because most of these billions of dollars are devoted directly to war activities.

There are many committees of this body now making investigations and studies of the various programs under these war agencies. We have been told that probably $2,000,000,000 have been saved through the renegotiation of war contracts. Almost every day those various committees are holding hearings to determine whether or not there is that efficiency, and whether or not these mandates for economy by this body are being carried out as successfully, as the American people are now demanding. Unfortunately it is difficult to effect retrenchment or reductions in these personnel supply bills, because there are certain obligations which must be met, but I should like to devote a few minutes at this time to a discussion of the report issued just a few days ago by the United States Civil Service Commission as of November 30, 1942.

We will recall that during the first World War, 1917–18, the peak of employment in the civil branch of the Federal Government was approximately 918,000. At that time we only had about four and one-half million men in the armed services. Today we have approximately one-third more men in the armed forces of our country, but this report of the United States Civil Service Commission states that as of November 30, 1942, there was a total of 2,750,101 persons employed in the civil branches of our Government.

I shall ask unanimous consent to insert at this point a table from the report showing employment in the year ending November 1942:

Civilian employment and pay roll in the executive branch of the Federal Government

[1] In the Washington, D. C., metropolitan area last pay-roll period ends on various dates. Pay-roll figures accordingly represent the total monthly pay-roll cost.

That figure of 2,750,101 is approximately three times the peak reached during the First World War, notwithstanding the fact that we have only about one-third greater personnel in the armed forces today. I should like to read one or two paragraphs from this report. I quote:

Civilian employment in the entire Federal service totaled 2,750,101 at the end of November 1942, compared with 2,687,093 a month ago and 1,546,131 a year ago. This was a net gain of 63,008 employees, or 2.3 percent during November—the smallest net change in recent months. The net increase of 1,204,970 employees over the 12 months elapsed since our declaration of war may be attributed largely to an expansion of civilian personnel of the military agencies. The War and Navy Departments combined increased by 1,048,019 during the year, most of which occurred in field establishments outside the Washington area. Total Federal employment in the Washington, D. C., metropolitan area increased 42.6 percent from November 1941 to November 1942 in contrast to 83.2 percent in all other areas combined.

Although war activities have resulted in increases in nearly all branches of the Government service, the combined employment of War, Navy, and war agencies more than doubled during the 12-month period while all other agencies together expanded only 7.4 percent. In November 1942, all war establishments combined showed employment gains of 58,444, representing a substantial proportion of the net gain during the month. The War and Navy Departments alone constituted 64 percent of all civilian employment in the Federal Government this month as compared with 46 percent 1 year ago.

We all recognize the necessity of employing extensive personnel in these war agencies such as the Army and the Navy, but it is significant that the War Department total of 1,213,088 is far in excess of the total civilian employment of all the executive branches and bureaus and departments during 1918. I quote from this report further, giving you first the figures of the past year as compared with November of 1941, which is approximately the date of Pearl Harbor, presenting a picture for the first year of our participation in this war:

War Department: 1,213,088; a year ago, 431,082. Navy Department: 547,786 compared with 281,773 a year ago. Maritime Commission: 6,667; a year ago, 2,856. Office of Censorship: 12,283 with no employees a year ago. Office of Price Administration: 37,817, with no personnel a year ago. War Production Board: 20,843, with only 5,268 in November of 1941.

We have heard much criticism in this body during the past month reflecting the Nation-wide resentment against this effort to regiment, and coerce, and control the activities of millions of Americans who are loyally cooperating and who are eager in every way to assist in our war program; yet we find the Office of Price Administration on November 30 with 37,817 employees. Is there anyone in this body who can successfully contend that this huge number might not be reduced to 25 percent of that total with better and more efficient administration as a result? Then they might successfully enlist the united cooperation and support of the American people at this time.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DWORSHAK. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is saying. I just wanted to observe that this House authorized an investigation of the civilian personnel in October of last year. I am very happy to see that for the first time in more than a year the November figures show a smaller increase than those for any of the preceding 12 months.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Yes; but this report shows that during that year there was an average increase of about 100,000 employees each month, and there was a consistent increase. The gentleman might be interested in knowing that a year ago the total pay roll for the 1,545,000 Federal employees was only $237,398,486—that is the monthly pay roll; whereas on November 30, 1942, the monthly pay roll had jumped to $454,415,055, or approximately doubled. Bringing this down to an annual basis involves a total of about $5,500,000,000 annually as the amount required to meet the civilian pay roll of our Nation—not taking into consideration our armed forces.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DWORSHAK. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Are the figures the gentleman just quoted for the country as a whole or just for Washington?

Mr. DWORSHAK. They are for the country as a whole. The Federal pay roll for the city of Washington for last November was $48,833,436, an increase of about $15,000,000 as compared with November of the preceding year.

I call attention to these figures because I believe that manpower is today one of the most vital issues confronting our Nation. It is true we cannot economize much in curtailing this Federal pay roll; nevertheless, today, as there is a Nation-wide demand for manpower on the farms, in the mines, and in our armed forces and our production plants, we must recognize that it is not only a matter of dollars and cents but that the Federal executive departments should immediately discharge all those employees who are not required at this time.

Mr. Chairman, manpower is the most vital factor today in achieving a military victory; not only must our armed services be adequately implemented but in our factories, in the shipyards, on the farms, and in the mines adequate personnel is essential if we are to coordinate our war efforts successfully. Every man, woman, and child must contribute something toward winning the war.

It is demoralizing for Americans to know that on the Federal pay roll are thousands of persons whose services are almost completely lost because of failure to adopt greater efficiency in the executive branch of Government. There is unrefuted evidence indicating widespread duplication of effort, overlapping of bureaus, and faulty supervision. I do not charge Federal employees with being less loyal or less patriotic than other persons because they have as much at stake in this present conflict. The war must not be used as a subterfuge for cultivating a bureaucracy as sinister and as menacing to the preservation of constitutional government as the threat of the Axis Powers.

One million persons can be discharged in the executive bureaus and agencies of Government without jeopardizing our national war effort. If the executive departments fail to act in a forceful manner, Congress must take drastic action through sizable reductions in appropriations, and thus keep faith with those on the battle lines and on the home front. This war cannot be won in Washington, but it might be lost here. It is our responsibility to prevent such a debacle.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, general debate on an appropriation bill provides a wide latitude of discussion. Subjects that are likely to become controversial usually are discussed during general debate on an appropriation bill. It is an occasion that usually provokes some tinge of partisanship. Some of us are critical of and others are defenders of policies.

It seems to me that it might be well under this first appropriation bill to try to establish something that might be said to be the tempo of discussion for this session of the Congress; in other words, to try to find a latitude, the latitude that will enable the minority to discharge its obligations as the opposition party and then, of course, according to the majority, that defensive position which it may feel necessary to resort to as the attack becomes pointed and pertinent. With that in mind, and especially in view of the presence of my beloved and distinguished majority leader here, I want to express the hope that, during the present session, as we indulge in the debates the majority will not adopt the attitude which was resorted to at a meeting of the Democratic National Committee a few weeks ago. When a certain diplomatic post was under consideration for appointment and when criticism was directed against the proposed appointee, according to the New York Times, the Democratic National Committee declared that the criticism of the appointment was, "A dastardly, treasonable plot to hamper the Commander in Chief."

Having the confidence that I do have in my very esteemed friend from Massachusetts, the distinguished majority leader, I feel confident that he will at no time resort to an expression such as that or, even, have the spirit which found expression in that statement as we debate the merits and the demerits of any bill. Hearing no objection, I assume that that latitude will be accorded to us and that we need have no fear that a similar slurring, smearing statement will be laid at our door.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I will always yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. McCORMACK. The fact the gentleman hears nothing has prompted me to feel that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania is of the opinion that being present his observation merits recognition by me. May I say that any observation made by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania who has the floor merits not only recognition by me but profound respect for his opinions, even when I might disagree. Without regard to discussing the quotations of the Democratic National Committee, but coming to the other observation made by my distinguished friend as to debates in the House and their relationship to myself, may I ask my distinguished friend if he has ever observed any indication on my part of an attempt, an honest attempt to engage in anything other than what might be considered debate that has met with the profound respect for the views of others, those on your side and those on my side with whom I might disagree?

Mr. DITTER. I should answer the distinguished majority leader by saying, and I attempt no flattery in this, that I know of no man who embodies a finer spirit of tolerance and a more complete sense of what democratic processes should be than my distinguished friend from Massachusetts. He commands my respect, my regard, and my esteem. There was no fear on my part as to what the distinguished majority leader would say in answer to my inquiry. However, I was fearful lest the enthusiasm of others on the majority side might not permit the same degree of tolerance that my friend from Massachusetts has always shown. Since my friend is taking a part in the debate, may I say to him that I had intended to refer to him and to pay him a compliment today?

Mr. McCORMACK. Before my distinguished friend proceeds, he may put me in a position where I might be precluded from making this observation temporarily.

Mr. DITTER. He will never be precluded from making any observation when I have the floor.

Mr. McCORMACK. I realize that, but it might be that the gentleman from Massachusetts may feel precluded from making it temporarily because he would not want the gentleman to yield at that time. May I say that I join, not only as majority leader but as a humble Member of this body of which I am so proud to be a Member, in everything that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has said about the debate being upon a high level, no matter how much we may disagree. Now, I do not want to make this a Damon and Pythias stunt, but my friend from Pennsylvania and everyone who has served with us before, knows of the profound respect I have for him, and that I think he is the ablest advocate of clean politics and an outstanding example of a high type of gentleman that I have ever met.

Mr. DITTER. I thank the gentleman, and again I am inclined to blush.

The reference that I want to make to the distinguished majority leader is a quote in the New York Times as of January 5, 1943, in which the majority leader is quoted as having said:

> If too many Republicans start thinking of 1944 politics, it will interfere with and prevent the Congress from making its maximum contribution to the successful prosecution of the war.

On behalf of the minority I think that we should thank the majority leader for the advice that he gave to the minority; but then I feel that we should remind him that since he was most generous in admonishing the minority, we hope he will not lose the opportunity of bringing the same counsel and advice to the Members on the majority side. Under present circumstances my impression is that few Republicans need worry about 1944 and that most of the worries as to 1944 are on the majority side.

If November 3 of last year points the way, then we need not start thinking of 1944, for the people did the thinking and started the ball rolling themselves. The majority is more concerned than we are over the problems of the 1944 campaign. I hope my friend will admonish the majority as he has admonished the minority.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has a little justification for boasting.

Mr. DITTER. I attempted no boasting.

Mr. McCORMACK. That construction might reasonably be put on it. However, I did not rise for that, I rose to suggest to my friend that I hope he will eliminate the word "admonished" and substitute therefor the word "advised."

Mr. DITTER. Having regard for that nicety for words my distinguished majority leader has at all times, I shall be glad to make the correction. I confess that as a member of the minority and realizing the position of the majority, I thought it was in the nature of an admonishment. If the gentlemen intended it as advice we will accept it as such.

In his message on the state of the Union, the President held out the hope to the American people that the cumbersome and complicated administrative procedure which the New Deal forged as shackles on efficiency in government would be simplified. That was indeed an encouraging note. It was encouraging to the burdened taxpayers who have carried on their backs the costs of this ever-increasing weight of nonsensical red tape. It was encouraging to the baffled and bewildered businessmen who have striven to survive, despite the avalanche of intricate forms and confusing questionnaires heaped on their desks almost daily by ambitious administrators. It was encouraging to those few courageous souls who having ventured as officials into the labyrinth of administrative procedure, soon found themselves in a maze of contradictions and conflicts from which they could see little hope of extricating themselves without inviting invective and abuse.

The cumbersome and complicated administrative procedure which the President promises to simplify has not come into being as a result of the war. True enough, it has become more irksome as each new agency connected with the war effort has added its contribution to the spider web of authority and power which has been spun here in Washington. The web, however, was well under way long before the war clouds gathered in Europe.

Many of us were apprehensive when the initial moves were made which have resulted in the present complications. Despite the warnings which we sounded and the objections which we registered, resort was had by the New Deal to every possible excuse for the creation of additional alphabetical agencies. Every new agency meant a new administrator. Every new agency meant a new jealousy. Every new agency meant a new ambition to exercise authority and to wield power. A keen competition was the natural result. Every new agency provided an additional opportunity for rewarding the faithful. The mushroom growth of administrative agencies was reflected in the ever-increasing number of Federal officeholders as patronage privileges were passed out with a generous hand. Defeated candidates for public office blossomed over night into full blown administrators and deputy administrators. And in passing we might add that the overnight miracle continues despite the proposed simplifications.

Parenthetically, I may say that I am sympathetic to those who fell by the wayside on November 3. My sympathy goes out to them. I can well understand why overnight blossoming is called for.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. If the gentleman wishes to amplify the suggestion I have made about this "Miracle Whip" program, I shall yield to him.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. I do.

Mr. DITTER. Miracle Whip is a commercial product. I am reminded of Miracle Whip as I see these administrators and deputy administrators blossom overnight, after they were brushed aside by the voters last November.

Now I yield to my distinguished friend from Florida.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. I should like to advise the gentleman that in the Democratic cloakroom there is a box of Florida oranges which I have just caused to be placed there. I should like to have the gentleman go back there and eat a couple of them, and I extend that invitation to all the other Members of the House.

Mr. DITTER. May I say that the offer is in line with the usual hospitality I have enjoyed at the hands of my distinguished friend from Florida at all times.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. The gentleman is very kind.

Mr. DITTER. I have enjoyed the hospitality of his home. May I say to the gentleman that I think his present generosity is due in no small measure to the fact that he has a charming wife who leads him in the right way.

The jealousies, the ambitions, the competition, to say nothing of the system of rewards, which was a vital part of the development, provided fertile fields for the harvest of confusions and complications that we are reaping today.

The President's assurance of simplification serves as an admission that the warnings, which were sounded in the past against the dangers of bureaucracy, were well founded. Obviously, there would be no need for simplification were there no complications. If the wheels of this gigantic administrative machine were moving smoothly, if the cogs in the wheels were meshing together, the process would need no correction. There would be no advantage to holding out the hope of simplification.

Nevertheless, it is refreshing and heartening to have this admission of fallibility. A studied effort has been made to clothe the imperfections of the New Deal with garments of omnipotence and infallibility. Some were inclined to insist on a pledge of fealty which had the substance, if not the form, of an earlier day when loyalty demanded of the subject the declaration that the king could do no wrong. To have, even at this late day, the admission of fallibility in administrative procedure augurs well for the future. It should mean that criticism is invited, that suggestions are welcome, that mistakes are possible, and that the New Deal is subject to the same human frailties as is every other man-made device.

Once we come to this point, we have come a long way. I want to impress that upon the new Members. For a long time the impression has prevailed here that this thing called the New Deal was far beyond the fallibility of human frailty, that it was something out of reach, almost wholly above us at times, a sanctum sanctorum that we had to approach with a great deal of trepidation and with obeisance. But this admission brings it down to the human level. Shortcomings and mistakes are possible. It is not infallible. It can be criticized. It can be subjected to the searching light of inquiry and investigation just as any other human institution can be.

Obviously, if the assurance of the President is to be carried out, radical changes must be made. There can be no simplification if the conditions which brought about the complications are permitted to continue. In fact, I doubt whether anything can be accomplished unless there is a change in some of the fundamental philosophy of the New Deal. The pantomime, which we are witnessing today, of the spenders of yesterday treading on each others' heels as they hurry to find a convenient place in the economy corner, will not simplify administrative procedure. Something more substantial and realistic must be done. There must be an about face on New Deal thinking—a change in what the New Deal conceives to be the place of the Federal Government in our system of government and in what it has assumed to be its place in the daily life of every citizen. There can be little hope of simplification if the sovereign rights of the States are to be absorbed by an ever-growing, colossal, centralization of power. Nor can there be such hope if every opportunity is seized upon by the Federal Government to extend its control over the thinking and the acting of every man and woman in the country. A supergoverment, such as has been imposed upon us, cannot be simplified. Certain policies make certain sequences inevitable. If what we think, and what we wear, and what we eat, and what we earn, and where we go, and what we do, are all to be policed, I question the possibility of simplification.

I am not dismissing from my mind the claim which I know is made that much of this policing is a part of the war effort. Some of it undoubtedly is. But, the regulating and regimenting of today, the intrusions on the lives of the individual citizen by a varied assortment of Government agents, differ only in degree from that which was set in motion when the "blue eagle" first screeched its praise of the N. R. A. An administration which conceived codes of fair competition as coming within the framework of our constitutional Government could hardly be expected to look with disfavor on ration books and the all-over regulating of the individual citizen.

If administrative procedure is to be simplified there must be a disavowal of the philosophy which found expression in the declaration that we will "spend and spend, and tax and tax, and elect and elect." Need I remind the House today of the place presently occupied by the disciple of the New Deal who coined this phrase as the marching song of the spenders a few short years ago? I confess that I find it difficult to reconcile a disavowal of a doctrine with a promotion in power and responsibility of the expounder of the doctrine. Disavowals do not take that form.

The "spend and spend, and tax and tax, and elect and elect" program was a part of, and a very important part of the development of administrative procedure. The two fitted together perfectly. In fact, they were dependent on each other. As one after the other of the administrative agencies were created additional excuses were available for more and more Federal spending which had to be met in part at least by more and more Federal taxing. The electing part of the process became the simpler as the spending became more widespread and the appointments to jobs became the more plentiful.

The war has brought home to the average American citizen the full force of the term "simplify." He has come to know just what it means in his everyday life. To him, it means doing without. Doing without many of the things that he considered indispensable—necessary for his convenience and comfort. And doing without is what simplify must come to mean to the New Deal if the cumbersome administrative procedure with which we are now weighted down is to be lightened. If every citizen is expected to tighten his belt, it is not too much to ask the administration to do the selfsame thing.

The responsibility for putting into effect the assurance of the President is divided. The Congress must do its part. But it cannot do it alone. If every executive agency resorts to subterfuge and cunning, if they avail themselves of every excuse for the continuation of activities, if they set out to intensify the frictions and complications so painfully apparent to every American, if they conceal the facts and figures which are pertinent to their operations, if their paramount purpose is the perpetuation of their own place in the sun, and if they are permitted to do these things by the President the Congress may find it impossible to accomplish very much toward simplification. I take the position that the executive branch of the Government shares with the Congress the responsibility for simplifying administrative procedure.

I am convinced the Congress stands ready to discharge its duty. I believe it understands fully the mandate of last November, when the American people registered so emphatically their disapproval of a continued course of incompetency, waste, and profligacy and demanded the restoration of sanity and common sense in government.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, if this Congress permits the regulation issued by the Manpower Commission the day before yesterday to stand, we might as well admit that we are helpless to act as a legislative body through this emergency. Certainly there is not a Member of this House who will contend that the Selective Service and Training Act was ever intended to be used for the procurement of industrial labor. This new regulation will create a very difficult situation in my own congressional district. Within that district we have several large defense industries, such as the Colt Patent Firearms Co., Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Corporation, Pratt & Whitney Tool Co., and others, and we also have there the home offices of many of the country's largest insurance companies. These companies, for the past several months have found it difficult to keep their employees, as many of them have been attracted by the wages paid in defense industries. About the only inducement the insurance companies have been able to offer their employees has been future security. Now those who pass up the chance of going into defense plants and the opportunity of receiving higher wages find that they must now go into the military service, regardless of the fact that they are married with young children to support, or else go into a defense plant. I am at a loss to understand how anyone in the executive branch of the Government can issue such a far-reaching regulation when it is certainly contrary to the laws passed by Congress.

When the Seventy-seventh Congress last amended the Selective Service Act, when it left this House, it had very definite language defining what proceeding would be carried on by local draft boards. It was very clear that no married man with children should be called into the military service while there were men without children subject to military service within that State. Somewhere along the line, either in the other body, or in the conference, that language was stricken out, but if the intent of Congress means anything, and I have usually understood that it does mean something, then certainly those in the Manpower Commission know definitely now that it was not the intention of Congress that married men with children should be drafted ahead of single men.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard in the past month numerous speeches from Members on both sides of the aisle objecting to the actions of some of the so-called bureaucrats in Government service. We have heard a lot about bureaucrats and bureaucracies. Frankly, I do not think that we can blame the bureaucrats for all of our troubles. This Congress must assume some of the responsibility itself. We should not sit back and wait for the bureaucrats to solve the problems we now face. For a long time we have known that this manpower problem was acute, but now, 14 months after Pearl Harbor, we have not solved the manpower problem by legislation.

I also want to refer to another problem that we failed to solve—the problem of how to make the best possible use of the facilities of our colleges throughout the country. I have in mind one medical school in Boston where last September they had seven applicants for every student they could accept in their medical school. These young men were perfectly able and willing, with the help of a scholarship in many cases, to go through the medical schools. But now I understand they are telling them that they will be taken into the military service and put in uniform, and instead of paying their tuition themselves, the Government will pay not only the tuition but give them a soldier's pay. By so doing we have not increased the number of doctors who will be available 4 or 5 years from now. Those men were willing to accept Reserve commissions and go into active military service upon completion of their education, but if this plan that is being discussed and has been proposed is carried through, and every graduate of a medical or a dental school in the United States is in the Army not only after he graduates, but while he is in school, where is our future supply of civilian doctors coming from? We know that the Army and Navy cannot take and should not take all of the doctors and dentists that the civilian population requires.

While we are talking about problems that this Congress must solve, I want to call your attention to a problem that we must face very, very soon, and that is the problem of providing adequate care for those who will be coming home from the hell of modern warfare, wounded and disabled. I do not want to see this Government make the same mistake that was made in 1918 and 1919 when men were brought back from the war and discharged immediately upon reaching the United States, and sent home with only a few dollars in their pockets, so few dollars that if they wanted to eat the second week they had to go to work the first week they were home. Thousands of veterans of the last war are now in mental and nervous hospitals and institutions who never would have been there for any length of time if they had had adequate and proper treatment during the first year they were home. Men were discharged from the Army who even a layman knew were nervous if not physical wrecks. If those men could have had 4 or 6 or 8 months in some kind of a convalescent home, in some camp or even in a hospital, to allow themselves to become adjusted from the terrific strain of modern warfare to the comparatively simple civil life, many of those men who broke down later never would have broken down.

So I urge upon the members of the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation to start in now making plans to provide sufficient beds and sufficient care for those men who are so soon coming back to us broken in mind and body. In my own congressional district we have a fine veterans' hospital at Newington, Conn., containing 304 beds. The power plant and all of the utilities, the nurses' home and operating rooms were built with the thought in mind that that institution would be expanded to a 500-bed hospital. Incidentally, General Hines has, on numerous occasions, testified before committees of this House that a 500-bed general hospital is the most economical unit to operate.

I urge that we now provide funds to increase that hospital from 304 beds to 500 beds.

The additional 196 beds can be added at a lower cost per bed than can be done by building a brand new hospital.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, these are discouraging days for Congressmen. In my mail this morning there was a picture of an elderly man, a storekeeper in a small village near my home, looking at a questionnaire from the Government and saying, "I am selling out. I am done. I cannot fill out all these questionnaires of the Government. I am giving up."

In the same mail from the same village came a letter asking me to ask for an appropriation of $5,000,000,000 to reimburse the people for their expenses in going to and fro to get their fuel and rationing cards. He made a careful list of his expenses, forced upon him because he must go personally to the central authority. The amount of gas he used to get his gas-rationing card used up much of his allowance. Numerous, indeed, are these complaints. It is more discouraging because we cannot seem to do much about it, except vainly protest.

I received in the same mail yesterday a communication stating that 1,000 people in one end of my small city were unable to get any kerosene for heating and cooking. I fear the patriotism of my people has been badly scorched. No wonder you worry about bureaucratic government on the majority side. We heard the speech made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas on yesterday, and speeches that have been made by other gentlemen on his side, but do not their faces get red when they recall how they voted for the last 8 years?

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman will look at the votes I have cast, I do not think he will find any cause to take exception to them in hewing to the lines of democratic and American principles.

Mr. GIFFORD. I said that because I well knew that you had voted contrary to your party's program many times and I thought you would have been disciplined by this time. But you would not like to apologize for the other gentlemen's votes, would you—for instance, the gentleman who has lectured us so much lately?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Exactly who do they have in mind by bureaucrats? Do they have in mind Mr. Brown or Mr. Wickard, or who is it?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I cannot particularize.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. There are probably 3,000,000 of these bureaucrats.

Mr. GIFFORD. It is such a hateful name to me. I do not indulge in name calling anyway.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Do you think that now since we are going to have our former colleague, Mr. McKeough, from the Kelly-Nash machine in Chicago out there in the Midwest where they produce food, he will be able to iron the thing out any better?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know; I presume he will do the best he can; he at least ought to have the viewpoint of a Congressman.

The House knows my humility. Yesterday I listened to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], and he stirred me quite a little. I tried to interrupt him. While I usually yield to anybody who wants to interrupt me, he hesitated to yield to me when I wanted to ask him a question. He is so overpowering; I admire him, really. He is a man of great stature; he is powerful in argument; he is a good lawyer, and one could not possibly take exception to him in his absolute correctness in quoting the law. But I did try to interrupt; and I may say in very good nature: "Great vessels may venture more, but little vessels must hug the shore." I am a little vessel keeping safely near the shore.

Certainly, he quoted the law correctly, and I thank him and I appreciate what he was trying to do. I am glad he freshened our minds on the law. I ought to know the law; I have been on the committee a long time, but I cannot always call these laws to mind perhaps because of brain fag; I cannot quote exact dates and the exact law, but I know that we passed an act in 1933 providing for $3,000,000,000 of printed money, supposedly national bank notes. We feared we would have to print money because the people might not be able to buy even 4-percent bonds. For some time we have provided that Federal Reserve notes should be issued for snakes from Burma if a bill of exchange was presented or on many kinds of property similarly acquired. Lately we use the Federal Reserve notes, protected by United States bonds. The Government should, and probably would, pay 4 percent on long-term bonds. They do not pay much interest on short-term securities, sometimes not more than one-half of 1 percent. As the gentleman said yesterday, it was cheaper to use the printed money already available than to print new money. But bear in mind that we have outstanding a tremendous amount of demand debt that is so highly dangerous that I want to hug the shore; I am frightened to venture much farther.

The Constitution states—and I shall repeat this over and over again until it gets in your mind—Congress may coin money, and fix the value thereof—yes; for the benefit of its own citizens, but not for the benefit of a Government to pay its own bills. Do not try to interpret it otherwise. Secondly, Congress can fix the standards of weights and measures. That is provided in the very same section. This does not mean that the Government can have a small peck measure as against the private citizen having the standard peck measure.

The gentleman from Wisconsin pleaded yesterday that we not lose faith in our currency. I agree with him. But he left the impression that he would venture more along the line he defended. I agree that it would hurt our currency but little at the moment even if we used the full $3,000,000,000. The method is highly dangerous and should be limited to a very small amount. Every country that has ever tried printed money based only on national credit has had disastrous results. Examples are plentiful. We should profit by others' experiences. It should not be done and it is entirely unnecessary at the present time. If the Government needs money, let it borrow from its citizens the same as you and I have to borrow, and pay at least competitive interest on it. I suggest we should pay 4 percent to the people when we take away their money, not 1½ percent. Many rather poor people are buying bonds from a patriotic impulse and we want them to hold them for a long period after the war, but they cannot do that unless a fair return is received.

Certainly they should be entitled to more than 1½ percent. The Government should pay this tribute exactly as you and I pay it. There is, of course, plenty of gold back of Federal Reserve notes. But that gold does not belong to the Government; that gold belongs to the people; that gold came into the various banks as deposits. We forced them to send it to the Federal Reserve banks and the Government would not let even them keep it. The Government took it but gave a mortgage in the shape of a gold certificate for that gold which belongs to the people. But let the people try to get it back. This administration fears to give it back. If you were privileged to take a $20 note to the bank and receive a $20 gold piece, they would hand you a gold piece that would be about one-half as large as formerly. Our people would then learn what we have been doing toward "watering the currency." The authority lies here in Washington to redistribute this gold, returning it to the people who really own it, but they seem to fear this practical demonstration of "coin clipping."

The question raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin yesterday was that they were within the law technically, although there was a reverse process. The Government did not furnish a bond to the Federal Reserve and get credit on its books; no, the Federal Reserve was expected to furnish only security to the Treasury with no interest or penalty attached.

It was the beginning of a process that we do not want continued—the step in procuring money without payment of interest.

We passed that $3,000,000,000 act in the belief that the public could not, or would not, buy bonds at that time. That act should have been repealed long, long ago. When you hint at silver worth 30 or 70 cents according to whether it is domestic or foreign, and issued at $1.29, I earnestly urge the immediate repeal of that act also.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL].

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, the course of the debate this afternoon has been on a high plane and to my way of thinking has been most constructive. Frankly, I have been very much encouraged by the indication on the part of the distinguished members of the Appropriations Committee that they are determined to take the bull by the horns and cut here and there in a courageous manner so that economy may be practiced, so far as nondefense expenditures in our Government are concerned.

May I also express my admiration for the membership of this committee by saying that I feel from their remarks made on the floor here at least that they are equally determined to assert the authority of the Congress against a growing demand of an ever-increasing bureaucracy which is asserting its power and authority more and more over the people we wish to represent back home.

I was particularly encouraged when I heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] earlier this afternoon say that he was through giving any blanket checks or giving the executive department of this Government further permission to write blank checks to increase this bureaucracy as it has been increased during the past years.

In the time allotted me today I shall elaborate upon the remarks I made a short time ago on the floor of the House when I protested some of the various steps that have been taken to regiment and to regulate the daily lives of people of every district in this country. May I say here and now that if the prestige of this Congress is to be maintained, further encroachments upon its power and upon the powers of the judicial branch of our Government must cease. It is our duty today and from now on to regulate the Budget of this Government so that the bureaucrats will be cut in such a way that they will not exercise any further arbitrary influence and authority over the people of the United States.

I wish to point out at this time that I consider it my duty to rise in the House on every occasion that I can to defend the American principles and privileges of the individuals back home and to fight in every way that I can for their welfare and against the encroachments of bureaucrats upon the peoples' rights.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Does not the gentleman believe that the plan proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] on yesterday, to limit use of the penalty mail on the part of the bureaucrats or the bureaus, or at least cut it down 50 percent, will be a good step in the direction to which the gentleman wishes this Congress to go?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. It was my privilege and pleasure to listen to the gentleman from Wisconsin yesterday when he put forth his proposal. I heartily concur in what the gentleman from Iowa has just stated. When I heard the statement that $300,000,000 was used last year to pay the communications bill of the administrative departments of the Government I was amazed. I was shocked that such a condition existed. Yet I could only conclude the correct figure must be somewhere in that neighborhood because it was so staggering. It is evident that the authority they are using has gone beyond all reason and is superseding the right and prerogatives of the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to protest the deliberate encroachment upon the authority of the Congress and to condemn the authority that has been given the administrative agencies of this Government. In my opinion, they are proceeding illegally on a good many fronts. They are assuming that Congress has given them authority in many cases, whereas the Congress has not done so, and it behooves every Member of the House, whether he is on the majority side or the minority side, to take cognizance of the way they are flaunting their powers in the face of the elected representatives of the people. I maintain that from now on it is either Congress or the bureaucrats. There can be no halfway course. Either you are going to surrender your powers to these administrative agencies of the Government or you are going to reassert your authority in this session of Congress before it is too late.

I maintain further that these people are proceeding with about 10 percent authority and 90 percent bluff. They are deliberately proceeding illegally in a good many cases that they are called upon to settle. They are made bold by the apparent hesitancy of Congress to question their prerogatives. They are made confident by the green light they have been given by those high in authority in this Government.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, everyone agrees with the gentleman's statement, if correct. I was wondering if the gentleman would give us a bill of particulars as to who was committing these illegal acts and what particular illegal acts they are committing. Of course, in court you would have to give a bill of particulars. You realize that?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Yes; and I am prepared at this time to give a big bill of particulars which the people of my district have passed on to me.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman would not make the statement unless he had some information particularly on the 10-percent law and 90-percent bluff proposition. That will be a pretty big bill of particulars, I know, but I am sure the gentleman can give it in his extension of remarks.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I will give it right now. I say that the Office of Price Administration is assuming powers that were never meant to be assumed by that agency, so far as the Congress is concerned. When it tells a pleasure driver that he cannot have his coupons for gasoline or that he must have his license taken away from him if he violates a petty regulation that they have made, I say that is illegal. I say that the Congress of the United States is the authority which should first write into the law regulations of that kind, and I contend that the Congress has never given such a prerogative to the Office of Price Administration.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not want to enter into any dispute with the gentleman because personally I want to get all the gas I can; but then I owe a responsibility to my country in war. Does the gentleman think the Congress could legislate from time to time 2, 3, or 4 gallons of gas, depending upon the exigencies abroad?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I have never disputed the right of the rationing agency to limit me to 3 gallons per coupon or 2 gallons per coupon, but I do dispute the right of any agency of government to make their own rules which supersede the courts and also the powers of the Congress. I also protest their snooping upon this or that individual citizen. They are superseding the rights that have been given them by Congress, and I protest it as a Member of this body.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROLPH].

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Chairman, in addressing the House at this time, I desire to tell our colleagues something about a special canteen service, sponsored and maintained by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of California, whose headquarters are in San Francisco.

This organization is making an outstanding contribution to the war program, and I am pleased that my fellow San Franciscans foresaw the need, and as a Member of Congress, I am glad to assist in furthering its splendid objectives.

This canteen service is entirely directed by veterans of previous wars, and has been in existence about 1 year. Through past experience these veterans are well equipped to understand and handle existing conditions in our present world crisis. The purpose is to furnish absolutely free, comforting necessities of life to the men in uniform. All branches of the Nation's war forces are served, whether hospitalized, en route, or overseas. This, of course, does not mean that the canteen service expects to give necessities to all the men in our services. That would be impossible, and would require a fund running into millions and millions of dollars, but as an instance, they serve men who are stationed in areas far from post exchanges. The supplies given out are sometimes only obtainable when the chaplain visits these distant posts. The men at these places, of course, are paid but cannot buy the articles. Many such places are scattered throughout the areas where our troops are operating. Then again, when men arrive at American ports without funds and awaiting orders to report to some other station.

Quantities of articles, far too numerous to list in full, have been delivered to our boys. To give an idea of a few, I have picked at random the following:

Over 11,000,000 cigarettes.

Over 200,000 bars of candy.

Over 20,000 bars of soap.

Nearly 40,000 packages of chewing gum.

More than 100,000 packages of razor blades.

Thousands and thousands of tins and sacks of tobacco.

About 2,500,000 pieces of writing paper and envelopes.

These items make an imposing list and this special canteen service may justly take pride in its accomplishments. Although it is organized and operated entirely by Californians, the service goes impartially to uniformed boys from all 48 States of the Union, as well as the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska.

Working entirely out of sight of the general public, and with all direct publicity prohibited because of wartime regulations, this canteen service works closely with the chaplains and morale officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. These officers are in best position to know where the needs are greatest, and are cooperating wholeheartedly in distributing the merchandise. Letters of acknowledgment and appreciation have been received from American boys in uniform throughout the world.

I would like to read two of these letters, one from the Army and one from the Navy. The Army letter, dated Fort Mason, Calif., September 19, 1942, and signed by Maj. William E. Millikin, special service officer, reads as follows:

I am writing to acknowledge receipt of and to extend my thanks for the two cases containing 20,000 Chesterfield cigarettes delivered to me September 17, upon my request to satisfy an urgent demand. These cigarettes were placed on a bomber early the following morning and flown to a task force in the southwest Pacific, where, I am sure, they will be thankfully received by men fighting the battle of the United Nations in that area.

I desire to express not only my personal thanks but the thanks of the special service officer and the men of this task force for this generous contribution from the canteen service of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

The Navy communication, on the letterhead of the twelfth naval district, Treasure Island, Calif., dated September 21, 1942, is addressed to J. R. Klawans, State administrator of Canteen Service, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and is signed by Enoch Jones, chaplain. The text is given in full herewith:

This is to express my thanks to you and to the Veterans of Foreign Wars for the splendid way in which you have responded to meet some of our needs here on "Treasure Island," by providing us with cigarettes, razor blades, soap, and other things for the health and comfort of many of our men here.

Those who made possible this aid to our men would be interested to know that most of the men who receive these articles are survivors of ships sunk by the enemy, some of them having survived two or three sinkings; therefore, they arrive here without these articles and with little more than the clothing they wear, which might be a discarded Australian soldier's uniform or a pair of discarded dungarees. Our friends therefore realize what a boost it is to the morale of these men to know that they have friends who welcome them back home with provisions for their health and personal comfort.

On behalf of these men, as well as myself, I wish to express our deep gratitude for the fine way in which our friends have responded to their needs.

Veterans of Foreign Wars Canteen Service is a nonprofit organization, maintained through voluntary contributions. In addition to some 70,000 display cards throughout California, many Veterans of Foreign Wars posts throughout the Nation contribute regularly each month, as well as do many private enterprises and individuals.

This special canteen service deserves every American's support, and I deem it a privilege to go on record offering my services in this worthy cause.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill down to and including page 3, line 7.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COURTNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, 1944, H. R. 1648, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the remarks I made in the Committee of the Whole two brief tables from a Civil Service Commission report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to ask the majority leader if he can tell us the program for next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to advise my distinguished friend and the House of the program for next week.

On Monday the bill providing for a merger of the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph companies will come up for consideration. There will be 1 hour of debate on the rule, and I believe the rule provides for 2 hours of general debate. If there is a roll call on the passage of this bill, or any other roll call on Monday, it is my intention, if it is agreeable to the House, that they be postponed until Tuesday.

On Tuesday the resolution providing for the extension of the life of the Dies committee will be considered.

On Wednesday and Thursday there will be general debate on the Independent Offices appropriation bill. That bill will not be considered under the 5-minute rule, which I may say for the information of the new Members is the amendment phase, until the following Monday.

Mr. TABER. There will be no votes on that bill until a week from next Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is correct.

Friday is the anniversary of Lincoln's birth, and, of course, many Members have speaking engagements for that day. I make this statement so that any Members having such engagements may know that there will be only general debate on Wednesday and Thursday, with no roll calls on those days, and they can make their plans accordingly.

I may say in connection with the appropriation bill now pending that we are meeting at 11 o'clock tomorrow in the hope that the bill may be passed tomorrow.

May I also say that in talking with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] earlier in the afternoon in connection with arrangements for general debate on the independent offices appropriation bill he told me he is very eager that when that bill is considered under the 5-minute rule a week from next Monday that the bill be passed on that day. I know the members of the committee on the Republican side will cooperate in every way possible to have that appropriation bill passed on that day.

That is the program for next week.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.), the House, under the order heretofore adopted, adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, February 5, 1943, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1943

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We pray Thee, our Father in Heaven, to send us forth to meet the challenge of this day, whatsoever it may be. Let us become kings of truth and justice until grief and sorrow have fled and mankind no longer moans beneath the iron yoke of political and religious tyranny. Open all hearts, our Father, to accept the light of a good God, through Jesus Christ our Lord, humanity's King and Saviour.

We ask Thy richest blessings upon those who seek to help their fellows, who guard our homes, teach our youth, and minister to the sick. Grant that all hatred and resentment may be banished afar and melted into the peaceful fruits of love and contentment. Oh, lead us to take the things of the spirit and make them very real to our hearts, with the deep certainty that no earthly affluence can atone for poverty of soul. Wilt Thou glorify Thyself, O God, and let the royalty of Thy grace build up thy people in humility and sacrifice. Keep us all in the sincerest sympathy with those great souls who fanned the feeble embers of democracy into a glowing flame of freedom which is destined to sweep the heart of the world. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the Historical Records Survey carried by the W. P. A. made a report on that work. It is of great interest to everyone interested in the history of the country, I think. The report will cost $22.50 more than is allowed in the regular congressional allotment. I ask unanimous consent that this may be published notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE MANPOWER SITUATION

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I have been receiving telegrams from furniture manufacturing companies and other civilian industries in my district protesting the latest order of Chairman McNutt. This is my answer:

This will acknowledge your wire of February 4 concerning the status of your employees.

This order "Work in necessary defense plant or be drafted" is one of the craziest of many crazy orders issued by McNutt. It would mean chaos in all nondefense industry. It is the same as removing the foundation from under a house and expect the house to stand up and continue to serve minus its foundation. Peacetime occupations that provide for the needs of the civilian population is the foundation under the entire war effort. Remove the peacetime occupations and the entire war program must fall. I cannot see how this crazy order can be carried out. Our civilian structure supports the war structure. Anything that tends to destroy the civilian structure must of necessity destroy the war structure. For that reason I call this order of McNutt's a crazy order. It should be revoked and I shall do what I can to have it rescinded.

N. M. MASON.

[Here the gavel fell.]

HON. RALPH R. ROBERTS

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the employees of this great legislative body from the lowest to the highest are today feeling a thrill of pride over the election of one of their own number, Ralph R. Roberts, to the office of Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives. This reward has come to Mr. Roberts after 20 years of faithful service to the House. It is strictly a reward of merit and it will be stimulating and inspiring to all who have chosen, or will hereafter choose, a career of service to this, the greatest of all legislative bodies in the world. Mr. Roberts is a Hoosier by birth and comes from a fine old family at Rockport, Ind. The State of Indiana will deem itself honored by the honor which the House has fittingly conferred upon this worthy son of Indiana.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a news article appearing in the New York Sun.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

YOU CANNOT SUBSIDIZE THE FARMERS OF VERMONT

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. PLUMLEY addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a brief editorial from the Dallas News on the subject of 1943 protein shortage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a joint resolution of the State Legislature of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE FARM LABOR SITUATION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, here is a letter along the same line as those read into the RECORD recently by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]. This comes from the wife of a farmer.

> Unless both Houses of Congress awaken we are going to be robbed of farm machinery, men, and food by the traitors who are both buying and selling us day by day.

Then she gives a list of farms in her vicinity that are going out of production for lack of machinery and farm help.

She adds a P. S. She cannot be very disloyal because she writes:

> I have three sons in the service and two more of draft age who are going.

But the woman is discouraged as are thousands of other women by the confusing orders of the administration.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an editorial from the Mississippi Sun.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understand there has been a change in the program for Tuesday and I would like to make inquiry of the majority leader if that is so?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. In addition to the program I announced on yesterday, the Smith resolution will be taken up on Tuesday after the Dies resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That is providing for the investigation of the different departments of government?

Mr. McCORMACK. The resolution gives them authority to conduct an investigation of any action, rule, procedure, regulation, order, or directive taken or promulgated by any agency, which I assume means department or independent agency of the Federal Government, where complaint is made that such action is beyond the scope of the power or authority granted by Congress. There are other provisions in the resolution, but it is more or less confined to an investigation to see whether these rules and regulations are beyond the scope of the authority granted by Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. As I understand it, there have been issued as many of these orders having the effect of law as there have been laws passed by Congress in the past 10 years.

Mr. McCORMACK. I would not be a bit surprised.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

UNSPENT WAR APPROPRIATIONS AND AUTHORIZATIONS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the President's Budget message, transmitted to Congress on January 11 last, contained the statement that—

> There are available about $170,000,000,000 of unspent war appropriations and authorizations; about two-thirds of this amount is already obligated or committed. Further appropriations will soon be needed to permit letting of contracts with industry for the next year.

It occurred to me on reading this statement that it might result in considerable confusion if a somewhat detailed statement were not presented to show the situation as of December 31, 1942, as it then existed, and projected to June 30, 1943, with respect to obligations, commitments, expenditures, unobligated balances, uncommitted balances, unexpended balances, and so forth, with respect to the entire war appropriation and contract authorization program of some $241,000,000,000 made during the period from July 1, 1940, to December 31, 1942.

Accordingly I requested the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to assemble and analyze all of the program finances from these standpoints so that I might make it available to the Congress and the country. The statement is an excellent one and presents a clear picture, both actual and prospective, as to the status of these funds. It should be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Public Printer estimates, in a letter to me of February 3, 1943, that this material will require four and three-fourths pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at a cost of $213.75.

Briefly, the statement shows that all of this vast sum will have been placed under obligation by June 30 next with the exception of approximately $8,000,000,000.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including the statements from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, February 8, immediately after the address by the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

SELECTION OF DOORKEEPER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to offer a resolution (H. Res. 101), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Ralph R. Roberts, of the State of Indiana, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Roberts appeared before the bar of the House and took the prescribed oath of office.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, February 10, 1943, after the legislative business of the day and other special orders, my colleague the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] may address the House for 30 minutes about China.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PROVISION FOR THE READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS ON FEBRUARY 22

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on February 22, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES] may be permitted to read Washington's Farewell Address.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter from John B. Weatherwax, attorney for the Associated Publishers.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may include certain letters and documents in the remarks I expect to make this afternoon in the Committee of the Whole.

TREASURY-POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1648) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944 and for other purposes

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 1648, the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill, 1944, with Mr. COURTNEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payments to the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation on account of reductions in interest rate on mortgages: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation such amount as the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury is equal to the amount by which interest payments on mortgages and real-estate sales contracts held by such Corporation have been reduced during the fiscal year 1944, and prior thereto, in accordance with the provisions of section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, approved May 12, 1933, as amended (12 U. S. C. 1016), as further amended by act of June 27, 1942 (Public Law 629); such payments to be made quarterly, beginning as soon as practicable after October 1, 1943, $7,400,000.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 3, after line 21, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used directly or indirectly during the fiscal year 1944 for the purchase, procurement, storage, guarding, checking, or transportation of silver under the provisions of the Silver Purchase Acts, namely, the act of June 19, 1934, and the act of July 6, 1939, or for the carrying out of any of the provisions of said Silver Purchase Acts."

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield for a preliminary question?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to yield for questions that will give enlightening information?

Mr. CELLER. I will be very happy to yield reasonably.

Mr. Chairman as the result of the Silver Purchase Acts of 1934 and 1939 requiring the Treasury Department and/or the Federal Reserve to purchase all newly mined silver, there has been purchased to date something in the neighborhood of 3,000,000,000 ounces of silver, now a huge stock pile stored at West Point, N. Y. From the information of experts that I have received, it is there serving no useful purpose and is tarnishing, despite the fact that that silver is a highly important war product that should be used in the war industries, to help us destroy the Axis. My amendment is wholly in the interest of the war effort.

It is difficult to imagine the size of 3,000,000,000 ounces, but I will give you some concrete idea of what 3,000,000,000 ounces really are. Imagine a stack of silver dollars as tall as the Washington Monument, 555 feet high, and then imagine 65,000 of those identical stacks. This will give you an idea of what 3,000,000,000 ounces of silver are, when bunched together. The entire sterling and plated-ware industry could subsist on those 3,000,000,000 ounces for 178 prosperous years—prosperous years I emphasize.

Roughly, about one-half of that silver is used to back currency. The other half is what is known as free silver. Take out any bills that you have in your pockets, whether they be silver certificates, national currency, or Federal notes, and I wager you have rarely, if ever, looked at the reading matter on those bills. As currency, one is the same as the other. We do not need any silver to back our currency. Our great Nation, with its untold wealth, is sufficient backing to give full faith and credit to any promises on any currency certificates that the Government may issue. Any issue by our great and glorious Government in the hands of the public will be accepted as legal tender without question, silver backing or no silver backing.

The War Production Board has been importuning persons, particularly in another distinguished Chamber, to be permitted to use that silver as a substitute for copper, tin, stainless steel, antimony, aluminum, and lead—all needed in war industries—but the door is slammed in the faces of the representatives of the War Production Board.

The administration does not wish to have these purchase acts remain on the books and in testimony before the Treasury Department Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, Secretary Morgenthau said last year and reiterated the same sentiment this year:

So far as I am concerned, I would be glad to see Congress strike the silver legislation completely off the books.

Thus the administration does not want these silver-purchase acts. It properly feels that to keep purchasing newly mined silver at the pegged price of 71 cents per ounce is asinine. It, in a word, feels that to keep augmenting that huge mountain of silver by continuing to buy more and more silver is ridiculous. It feels it is absurd to immobilize that huge stock pile of silver at West Point and prohibit its sale or use save for more limited purposes. I have bills pending before the Ways and Means Committee to do a real job of wiping out these useless, senseless statutes. It may take some time to get hearings on those bills, but meanwhile this Chamber should discharge its duty to the Nation and endeavor to indicate to the Nation its wishes; therefore I have asked that no moneys be appropriated for the Treasury Department for the purchase, procurement, transportation, for the storage and for the checking of this great vast monument of useless silver erected to false silver gods. I am sure that if William Jennings Bryan, the great exponent of silver, would come into this House of Representatives today and you were to ask him a question whether we need that huge stock pile of silver, he would answer in the negative. Therefore we should chisel through the base of this monument erected to a false god, this monument of folly, this obelisk of absurdity.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from New York has said that he has a bill pending to change the program in reference to the issuance of currency. Does it provide for eliminating the Federal Reserve banks and to have the Government issue the money directly?

Mr. CELLER. Oh, no; it has no such purpose and it is not the intent of my bill to bring about such a result. The primary purpose of the bill is to do away with continuous purchase of new silver.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Do I understand the effect of the gentleman's amendment would be to prevent the Government from buying silver, which will find a ready market in industry?

Mr. CELLER. We cannot very well in this appropriation bill prevent the Treasury Department from purchasing the silver, because unfortunately that silver is purchased by the Federal Reserve, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What does this amendment do then?

Mr. CELLER. All this does is to prevent the Treasury Department from making outlays of any money whatsoever in connection with the purposes of the Silver Purchase Acts, incidentally in connection with the purchase or storage or guarding of it, the checking of it, or the transportation of it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Then the amendment is not really accomplishing much, although it might well be interpreted as the sentiment of the House.

Mr. CELLER. It is helpful in the sense that it is an indication of what the Congress intends to do. The gentleman may recall that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] attempted in another body to make certain changes in the Silver Purchase Acts in order to release that silver for war industries, but he was balked in his efforts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I was interested in one statement the gentleman made about the War Production Board. Is it not a fact that the War Production Board is actually trying to put some of the industries out of business anyway? Certainly they have failed to fully cooperate in keeping plants going when it would have been easy to do so without interfering with the war effort.

Mr. CELLER. I would not say that. The War Production Board is hampered by these Silver Purchase Acts; it cannot get this silver to replace the strategic metals in the war work. It cannot allow the use of silver for civilian industries, for the silver-plate manufacturers, the photoengravers, and so forth.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The War Production Board is preventing many industries from using silver they have already bought and transported here from Mexico and now have in their factories.

Mr. CELLER. The War Production Board is taking the mere trickle that it gets from the Defense Plants Corporation, through the Treasury Department, for use in war industries. It is a mere trickle. This is how it is done, may I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Treasury Department is precluded from selling its silver except at $1.29 per ounce. It purchases the silver at 35 cents an ounce, practically the world price. Nobody would buy it for $1.29. The price is too high.

This is what the Treasury does. By bypassing the Silver Purchase Acts it "lend-leases" a small portion of this metal to the Defense Plants Corporation as though it were lending the silver to itself. This certainly is a subterfuge, although supported by an opinion of the Attorney General. For example, when one of the war industries says, "We are in urgent need of copper; we cannot get enough copper; give us some silver to use as bus bars to conduct electricity"—and silver works as effectively as copper in that regard—then the Defense Plants Corporation lends these silver bars to the defense plants to be used as bus bars in the war effort. That is called a nonconsumptive use. It means that the identical silver bar must be returned to the Treasury after the war, in the same form, shape, quantity, and size. It cannot be used for a consumptive use. It cannot be melted down and used to make important implements or parts thereof, to be placed in antiaircraft guns, artillery, planes, submarines, tanks, and searchlights.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York that I am in sympathy with what he is trying to accomplish, because the situation at present is intolerable. I believe the War Production Board has not been very sympathetic and has been more or less negligent in handling the problem. However, I would not want people to get the idea that we are accomplishing very much here today, for we are simply making a gesture as to the intent of Congress. Other and more positive legislation will be needed.

Mr. CELLER. I admit that my amendment just indicates our intention. It marks whither we are going. We must do that. We must indicate to the people how ridiculous and woefully fallacious it is to keep these silver-purchase statutes on the books. Silver is a slacker metal. I want to put silver in uniform, to make silver fight. It is time to get mad about silver.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If you get "mad" about some other things, too, we will be all right.

Mr. CELLER. Let us get "mad" and adopt my amendment as the first move, as the prologue of what will follow. If the Axis came here with their saboteurs and did not find the Silver Purchase Acts on our books, they would pay $1,000,000,000 to have those laws written on our statute books, because they help the Axis by making us starve in the midst of plenty. They deprive us of a very important metal. We have plenty of silver and we cannot touch it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. For the sake of the record, who put these acts on the statute books?

Mr. CELLER. I reluctantly state that it was done by a Democratic administration in a moment of aberration. We made a mistake, but we will be making a greater mistake, Republicans and Democrats alike, if we continue the blunder. It has been made known to the gentlemen how ridiculous these statutes are. Let us take some steps to change them. We would otherwise be derelict in our duty.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 2 additional minutes in order to answer some pertinent questions on the silver issue.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman states that silver is unavailable for war purposes. Does the gentleman know that there are 46,000 tons of free silver allocated to the defense industries? They were allocated in May, and the defense industries have been able to take 22,000 tons of this silver. There remain available 24,000 tons of the silver to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. CELLER. If the gentleman admits it is proper to allow that mere trickle of silver to go to the War Production Board, then let us allow all of it to go. The W. P. B. wants all of it. Give it to them. Help win the war.

Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman call 22,000 tons a trickle?

Mr. CELLER. There is no need to have that silver where it is—at West Point—not an ounce of it. Whatever silver the W. P. B., by virtue of a most unusual opinion of the Attorney General, has been able to wheedle out of the Treasury Department can only be used for most limited purposes—nonconsumptive use, to wit, only practically for bus bars and the like. You have deprived silver of its many other chemical and metallurgical uses.

Mr. WHITE. Is it the gentleman's contention that 22,000 tons of silver is a mere trickle?

Mr. CELLER. I admit that that amount has been allocated, but with ridiculous lend-lease strings attached to it. It can be used only for the manufacture of bus bars, in electrical manufacturing plants, and that is the limit.

Mr. WHITE. But——

Mr. CELLER. Oh, wait a minute. The gentleman has asked the question and he has got to take what I have answered. Silver can be used only for bus bars and after the war must be returned to the Treasury, it cannot be used in airplanes, it cannot be used in tanks or guns, it cannot be used in searchlights; it must be used only for what is called nonconsumptive uses. I want no strings attached to the silver that may be used in the war effort. I want to use it so that the boys on the front can have use of the silver. As I said, I want to put it in uniform, and make it do war work. Today it is doing work for only some 60,000 people of the Silver States, and the only ones benefited by these acts are the 60,000 miners, and the potbelly owners of the mines, of 6 or 7 western Silver States, who have by a tremendous bluff forced these statutes on the Nation, and now it is time to puncture those potbellies and destroy this monument of silver, erected to asininity and selfishness.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, whatever the intent of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] may be, his amendment, as it is drawn, will not put silver "in uniform," as he says he wants to do. The thing that the amendment proposes is to take away the possibility of keeping the guards and the records, and to take away the possibility of transporting the silver that the Government already owns. The amendment provides that—

No part of the money appropriated may be used for the purchase, procurement—

Those things may move in the direction he wants, but listen—storage, guarding, checking, or transportation.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE. Of silver acquired under the purposes of the Silver Purchase Act. I am sorry. The gentleman has had ample time. If you provide that no part of this appropriation may be used for the storage, guarding, or transportation of the silver purchased under the Silver Purchase Act, then the silver will be perfectly sterile, and it will not be put "in uniform" or anything done to put the silver into industrial use. It will effectually stop the Treasury from using the silver it now has for bus bars or any of the other purposes, such as the Treasury has found it can use the silver for, under existing law. In other words, whatever the gentleman from New York has in mind, the amendment offered does not accomplish it. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is no difficulty in determining whose ox is being gored today. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] explained that thoroughly, and I agree with what the gentleman from South Dakota had to say about it.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? My ox is not being gored.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, wait a minute. I am talking about the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]. I cannot yield as to that.

Mr. CASE. I am glad, then, to have the record clear on that point.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is not that funny? I was not talking about the gentleman from South Dakota at all, I was talking about the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], who seemed to be speaking for the commercial users of silver. The gentleman from New York will recognize it. Here is what is plain as can be. The manufacturers of jewelry have been getting it in the neck, and I note the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] nods his head in the affirmative, yes. That is the reason we have this amendment. It does seem silly that nothing shall be done to protect the silver if nothing is done to prevent the purchase of the silver. The gentleman admits that we cannot stop them from buying it by this amendment. He says it is just a gesture, and then he goes on and admits that the Democrats—no, not the Democrats, but the New Deal administration—made a mistake when they passed this bill. I say to you Republicans, when the New Dealers come in here and confess their sins and repent, even if it is nothing but a gesture, let us help them in their gesture, and maybe their repentance will go down deep enough some time later so that they will come along with legislation that strikes at the evil. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] said he is in sympathy with the purpose of this amendment. We all want to vote for legislation that will repeal this Silver Purchase Act. I offered a bill in 1935 or 1936 for that very thing, so that if now they are only making the motion, let us help them, and soon we may have real action.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. COMPTON. If this amendment is adopted, who is going to take care of the silver and protect it?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, I suppose the same authorities who would take care of and protect any Government property. They would take care of the silver. I do not imagine they would give it all away, or let the gentleman or myself go down with a truck or a wheelbarrow and help ourselves.

Mr. CELLER. The silver is purchased by the Federal Reserve System, and that System has nothing to do with this bill. There will be plenty of guards, and the gentleman need not worry about that. The silver will not be left unguarded.

Mr. HOFFMAN. We can count on the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE], and the silver bloc in the Senate to protect all the silver we can buy.

The amendment should be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIRKSEN as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: On page 3, after line 21, add a new section, as follows:

"No part of any money appropriated in this title shall be used to pay the compensation or expenses of any officer or employee who engages in, or directs or authorizes any other officer or employee to engage in or carry out section 3 of the act approved June 19, 1934, known as the Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CASE. As I heard the reading of the gentleman's amendment, it seems to me the intent of that is merely to stop the purchase of new silver?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right.

Mr. Chairman, I find the same fault with the Celler amendment that was found by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]. It will interdict the use, transportation, and storage of silver that we have already acquired. The principal purpose of the Congress, I think, and the principal objection to the silver purchase program as it now exists lies in the continuing purchase of silver and in the subsidy provision that is contained therein. For that reason I offer the same amendment that was offered last year, in the month of February, to be exact, to the same bill, and which was first approved by a vote in Committee of the Whole and subsequently defeated on a teller vote by only three votes.

Today I appeal to you for support of this substitute amendment. When it was offered last year, as recorded on page 996 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, my good friend the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. LUDLOW] had this to say:

Personally I have a great deal of sympathy with the objective which my friend the gentleman from Illinois seeks to accomplish. I think the Silver Purchase Act is an indefensible subsidy. If he would introduce a bill and let it take its regular legislative course, I would talk turkey with him on it, because I really have strong convictions on the same side that the gentleman is on with respect to this proposition.

That came from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] who is presently also chairman of this subcommittee.

May I say to him that I did introduce a repealer in the Seventy-sixth Congress, in the Seventy-seventh Congress, and in the Seventy-eighth Congress, and if energy permits and I am permitted by the grace of God and the sufferance of a generous constituency in Illinois to remain a Member of this body, I shall continue to introduce a repealer until this very indefensible act is taken from the books. It is inflationary, as indicated by the fact that silver certificates in circulation jumped from $401,000,000 in 1934 to $1,920,000,000 in 1942. Here is Mr. Henderson of O. P. A., here is Mr. Byrnes, the stabilizer; here are other agencies of Government that are seeking to put a capstone upon prices in the country and prevent inflation; yet here is an act upon the books which has multiplied the silver certificates in circulation by nearly 400 percent, and the Congress has been remiss in its duty in not having expunged it from the books before.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; I cannot yield just now.

The Secretary of the Treasury is against this act and wants it taken off. On page 404 of the hearings last year he said:

So far as I am concerned I will be glad to see Congress strike all silver legislation from the books.

This year in the hearings he said substantially the same thing. In December at a press conference he said the same thing. Here is the man who presides over the monetary destinies of the country suggesting within the limit of his power to the Congress to expunge this from the books, and yet we have failed to do so.

The Economists National Committee on the 20th of April 1942, representing the finest monetary minds of the country, has memorialized the Congress to take this from the books.

On the 31st of October the Saturday Evening Post editorially said:

There is no use for the high priests of the silver set to continue this disastrous policy. It is time for less goggle-eyed statesmen to take over.

That is an appeal to the Seventy-eighth Congress to act, and to act today, upon this matter.

On the 18th of December the New York Times said:

The fight should be renewed promptly in the coming session of Congress, and this time the objective should be to sweep clean away the whole structure of silver subsidies.

Mr. Morgenthau, in his press comment on December 14, reiterated that very thought.

In the January issue of the American Mercury, Mr. Elliott V. Bell, who is superintendent of banking for the State of New York, provides an article entitled "The Scandalous Silver Bloc."

On the 20th of March 1942 there appeared this quotation from Marriner Eccles, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board:

In view of the war situation it is all the more urgent that the inflationary effects of the silver program be removed and that so far as possible the materials, machinery, and labor now devoted to silver production be utilized in the war effort.

There is a big businessman. There is the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

Under a release of April 1942 he makes a public statement in which he says that the inflationary effects of silver should be removed.

The American National Retail Jewelers Association said in a letter addressed to all Members of Congress on the 28th of December:

Why, in the name of common sense, is it that the vast stock of silver is buried at West Point when it could be made available first and most important for all war industries, and, next, for the silver business?

I could go on and read testimony after testimony from authorities in high places that this is something to which the Seventy-eighth Congress should address itself in forthright fashion and now.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I wish to call attention to a fact in which I think all Members of the House are interested, namely, that the Ways and Means Committee, following the lead and suggestion of the Treasury and the group that believes that the thing to do is to tax the people to drain off their spending power to stop the threat of inflation, are defeating that effort by this very subsidizing of silver.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it not singular that Milo Perkins, Administrator of the Board of Economic Warfare, licenses every export of silver to make sure that it does not fall into the hands of Hitler, and yet we immobilize silver; we take it from one place in the earth and transport it across the country and then bury it in a hole in the ground at West Point surrounded with troops; so we are immobilizing a very valuable and critical war material. The time is now for the Congress to go on record and to strike once and for all this indefensible policy from the books. I recognize that the substitute has its limitations, but it at least will be a stimulant and an incentive for the House Banking Committee and the Coinage Committee to get busy at once and to repeal all of the provisions of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. We have enough silver now to provide four dozen or more teaspoons for every man, woman, and child in the United States of America. What an amazing thing. It is immobilized, having no value, and yet the silver people, having so carefully conducted a campaign with the Treasury that when they release the silver it is only a temporary release for an emergency use and must be returned, it cannot be employed in so-called consumptive uses. It in fact is but a loan of silver for industrial uses and must be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

The gentleman speaks of inflation. Does the gentleman know that the Federal Reserve currency has been inflated by two and a half billions in the last 6 months, and does he know that it is being inflated at the rate of half a billion dollars a month? And on top of that we are putting out $66,000,000 Federal Reserve bank notes that do not have a thing behind them in the way of security except the promise of the Federal Reserve bank?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Shall we try to remedy one wrong by adding another wrong to it? Both wrongs should be corrected instead of following the policy of our good friend from Idaho of loading one more wrong upon another; and so it becomes necessary today to begin attacking the problem. Do not be fooled by this talk that they have released 497,000 ounces of silver and that they are being generous to the war effort. Not an ounce of that silver but what has to go back into the Treasury for monetary purposes; that is the provision they tie to it. There was a mandate from the people of this country on the 3d of November 1942, and this will be our first real occasion in the Committee of the Whole to stand up and reecho that mandate to the people of the country and show that the Seventy-eighth Congress has got its feet on solid ground; and we propose today in a great swelling crescendo to say to the people that this is one of the first things we shall do in pointing the country in the direction of a policy that is fundamental, that is sound, that is sensible, and that is designed to get this country back once more on the high road of a sunlit prosperity.

Mr. HOLMES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOLMES of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell us whether or not his substitute amendment will release some of this hoarded silver to the avenues of trade to get industries going and keep them in operation without putting them out of business?

Mr. DIRKSEN. This is directed entirely at the continuing purchase of silver under this subsidy plan through which we have already spent about $550,000,000 in subsidies to about 60,000 people who are identified with the silver industry. It is as far as we can go on an appropriation bill. Under the rules of the House we may not add anything that is legislative or anything that gives affirmative direction to the Treasury Department. We have got to do the best we can. We should rise in support of this amendment, and then direct the appropriate committee to take action looking to the complete repeal of the Silver Purchase Act.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can get an agreement on time?

I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LUDLOW. Can we make it 20 minutes?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment to the amendment pending at the desk on which I should like to be heard. This is perhaps the most important question that has been before this Congress this year. I do not think debate on this involved amendment should be cut in just 20 minutes.

I object for the time being.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes. Surely everyone can be heard in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not think we should be foreclosed.

Mr. TABER. Is that on this section and all amendments thereto?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Does that mean that the time will be divided among those who stood at the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. LUDLOW. There were only seven Members who stood up.

Mr. TABER. Thirty-five minutes ought to cover it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think this issue is too important to the people to be foreclosed by an abridgment of debate. It is untimely at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. And I want to reserve to myself 2 minutes to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I want at least 10 minutes to answer this argument, and I want it understood that I may have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Chair announced that, without objection, something would be done. None of us heard what that was.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] asked unanimous consent to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to all three amendments, the original amendment, the amendment to the amendment, and the substitute therefor. I am not much of a parliamentarian, but it seems to me that this is an unparliamentary procedure to attempt to tack on an appropriation bill something which ought not be done that way, and I hope the committee will take note of that matter. It seems to me that this is an attempt to change the fundamental law of this country regarding money by a makeshift, slipshod, ill-considered method. Even if it were a commendable thing to do, this is not the proper manner in which to do it, on an appropriation bill.

What is the issue here? We have heard a lot said today about inflation. We have heard it said our use of silver brings about inflation. Talk about straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. It may be that our monetary supply is being increased slightly through the use of silver, but not more than increased business demands, and it is a very trivial increase compared with that increase which is taking place through the issuance of Federal Reserve notes and through the tremendous increase of bank credit. Such inflation as has occurred in this manner is but a drop in the bucket to the total inflation that is occurring in these war days.

Who is going to be benefited if we wipe out all silver legislation from the books? Evidently Members on both sides of the aisle who are proposing these amendments want to wipe out all recent silver legislation. I repeat, who will benefit thereby? This proposed measure, so far as it affects our money, indirectly goes contrary to article I, section 8, clause 5, of the Constitution of the United States, which every one of us has taken an oath to uphold and defend.

The Congress shall have the power to coin money.

The fathers who wrote the Constitution of the United States intended that we should have metallic money. We do not talk about coining paper bills or currency. Only gold and silver can be coined and made a legal tender in payment of debt, according to many men's view of the fundamental law. What do the movers of these amendments want?

I fear they want us to do away with the kind of money which the fathers intended we should have and substitute another kind of money, bank currency. I am not now condemning that kind of paper money, but I have some questions concerning it even on its own merits.

I want it understood, as the gentleman from South Dakota stated, that my ox is not being gored by these proposals. I have not a penny's worth of personal interest in any silver mines. It is true that my State produces silver, but it produces silver in connection with copper. If you are going to repeal any law, why not repeal the law of nature which places the precious metals along with the baser metal deposits in our land. Our copper mines, zinc mines, and lead mines all contain more or less silver. If you kill silver as a commercial product—while it is a critical metal—you will also do great harm to the other strategic materials, such as copper, lead, and zinc. The contention that we must put silver into the war is pure propaganda. That is a smoke screen to hide another purpose. Something else is wanted. Our war effort has not lacked for silver, statements to the contrary notwithstanding and I have heard the best friends of silver express desire to use silver fully in the winning of the war and the peace.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] for 4½ minutes.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I think this House wants to be fair. I think its Members want to be informed about an issue as important to business security and the welfare of the American people as this issue is. I cannot present even the essential facts in the limited time of 4½ minutes. I therefore appeal to the House. I do not think the plan that is being followed here is fair to its Members or to the country.

In the brief time at my disposal I am going to proceed to give you a few facts.

What are the opponents of silver money seeking to strike down here? They are seeking to strike down the only monetary program of the Government on which the Treasury is making a profit—the monetization of silver under the provision of the present law—which provides for the use of silver produced in this country for money, just as gold produced in foreign countries is used for money at a handsome profit to the Government and at no expense to the taxpayers. I will read section 4 of the Domestic Silver Purchase Act:

SEC. 4. (a) Each United States coinage mint shall receive for coinage into standard silver dollars any silver which such mint, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, is satisfied has been mined subsequently to July 1, 1939, from natural deposits in the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

(b) The Director of such mint with the consent of the owner shall deduct and retain of such silver so received 45 percent as seigniorage for services performed by the Government of the United States relative to the coinage and delivery of silver dollars. The balance of such silver so received, that is, 55 percent, shall be coined into standard silver dollars, and the same or any equal number of other standard silver dollars shall be delivered to the owner or depositor of such silver.

The provisions of the law are plain. There is no subsidy mentioned. The silver miners simply bring in the silver they produce and contribute 45 percent to the Government and receive in return the remaining 55 percent coined into dollars as their share, or its equivalent in money.

There is nothing in this law said there about price. We simply provide that the money metal produced by the miners of this country shall be coined into standard silver dollars, Uncle Sam taking 45 percent of that silver produced by our mines as his.

What has been accomplished under that law? Let me read from the monthly Treasury Bulletin and the statement of the Treasury that comes to your desk daily. I am going back to the 30th day of September and the Treasury Bulletin of that date. As a result of the operation of this law, the Treasury of the United States has put into circulation $2,000,000,000 in dollars and silver certificates. What profit have we made in doing that? On referring to the silver seigniorage tables on page 78 of the September Treasury Bulletin you will find that the Government has made $816,900,000 profit in the form of seigniorage in buying silver at the statutory and market price, revaluing it and putting it in circulation as money. Is there anything wrong about the Government's making a profit and putting money into the channels of trade without borrowing it from the banks and paying interest on it?

Let me show you from the Treasury's reports how the Government's silver accounts stand. The surplus silver obtained under the operations of this law as shown on the Treasury statement of September 30 amounts to 1,337,733,452.4 ounces. In other words, 45,000 tons of silver that has not cost the taxpayers of this country a nickel—silver that is now going into war industries.

I have no time to go into the testimony of Mr. Brownell, heading the company that is the largest buyer of silver in the world, and show you that there is no shortage of silver, but the nonconsumptive needs of the war industries are being met by allocating this surplus silver to the defense industries. The consumptive uses are being more than met by the allocation of foreign silver being imported at the rate of 100,000,000 ounces annually. The Treasury has another stock of silver on hand amounting to 5,000,000 ounces in a separate category that it is supplying to our war industries. The Treasury is permitting the jewelers, the very people who have laid down a barrage of misleading and false propaganda against silver, to buy all the silver they want for their uses at the domestic price of 71.11 cents plus the freight, but these jewelers do not want to do that. What they are driving for is cheap silver and the destruction of our interest-free silver money.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. Does not the gentleman know that no silver is being imported at this time, that we cannot import it?

Mr. WHITE. If the gentleman will consult the Treasury and the War Production Board, as I have, he will find that silver is coming into this country at the rate of 108,000,000 ounces annually. Read the testimony of Mr. Brownell, president of the American Smelting & Refining Co., that I have here.

Mr. CELLER. Read the hearings.

Mr. WHITE. I do not have time to present the facts. It is too bad that an issue of this importance should be kicked about here and the Members of the House should permit parliamentary manipulation to keep them from having the facts. This issue means so much to the welfare of the people. We are heading into a Niagara of inflation. Let us leave one island of redeemable money in this deluge of irredeemable paper tokens that is flooding the country as an anchor for business and our national economy.

Surely the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois, who preceded me, are familiar with the regular daily and monthly reports of the Treasury that come regularly to every Congressman's desk—Treasury statements that show the profits the Government has made in purchasing silver and using it as money. Can it be possible that these gentlemen have overlooked the silver-seigniorage table appearing on page 80 of the last monthly bulletin of the Treasury for January, which shows that the Government has made a profit of $245,700 in the form of the seigniorage on the minor coins alone, and when we come to the seigniorage on silver dollars and silver certificates we find that the Government has made $818,900,000. A part of this seigniorage profit is represented by the surplus silver amounting to 1,296,223,206.5 ounces, or 45,000 tons, appearing in the Treasury statement as an item in the general fund at its cost value of $627,773,861.13. To get some idea of the actual profit the Government has made on the Treasury silver purchases and the issuance of silver money, we can deduct the cost of the surplus silver from the profits shown in the seigniorage table of $818,900,000, and we find that the Treasury, besides obtaining this surplus silver, has made an additional profit of $191,126,139.

I say without fear of contradiction by either the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Illinois or anybody else that no government of any country at any time has ever made as large a profit on any program that created and put redeemable money into circulation.

If these gentlemen have consulted the Treasury reports they must know that all the 45,000 tons of surplus silver has been allocated to the Defense Corporation for nonconsumptive use and is being delivered as fast as it can be used. The facts are that this allocation was made on May 26, 1942, delivery was started on June 6, 1942, and at this late day, February 5, 1943, only 22,000 tons or less than half of this silver has been taken by the Defense Plants Corporation for the use of our war industries, and if they have taken the pains to consult the Treasury and the War Production Board and ascertain the facts, they must know that there is a surplus of silver available now to supply both the consumptive needs and the nonconsumptive needs of the war industries. The consumptive needs of the war industries are being supplied by the allocation of foreign silver being imported at the rate of 108,000,000 ounces annually.

Besides the allocation of foreign silver for the consumptive use of the war industries the Treasury holds an additional and special stock of silver amounting to 5,000,000 ounces of so-called ordinary silver obtained by refining silver from mixed gold bullion of which 4,000,000 ounces remained to be delivered at 45 cents per ounce on priority allocations to the war industries. If they have consulted the Treasury and the silver bullion dealers as I have they must know that the silver requirements of the jewelers and silver manufacturers for civilian use can be filled by the purchase of domestic silver at the statutory price of 71.11 plus the freight by a special concession of the Treasury. The records disclose that there is an excess over their purchases on these terms amounting to 2,000,000 ounces in October, 1,200,000 ounces in November, and 500,000 ounces in December which these silver consumers permitted to flow to the Treasury. In face of these facts how can these gentlemen support the statement they have just made on the floor of the House to anyone cognizant of democratic and republican ideals, one dedicated to advancing the welfare of labor and the preservation of American living standards and the other pledged to the protection of American industry from the competition of cheap foreign goods, produced by cheap foreign labor.

The contention of my eminent colleague the Democratic Member from New York [Mr. CELLER] and the illustrious Republican from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], that the miners' share of money coined from the silver bullion they produce is a subsidy, is out of harmony with American ideals when we consider the policies of our Government in establishing and maintaining domestic price levels, particularly wheat and cotton by Government financing. As a result of this financing, the price of wheat at Buffalo is $1.50 per bushel. Across the line at Fort William, in Canada, the price of Canadian wheat is 90 cents per bushel. Cotton is selling for 7 to 8 cents per pound in Brazil, while our Government maintains a price of 20 to 21 cents a pound in our domestic market. The subsidy to maintain this price for wheat is costing the Government $50,000,000 annually. The cotton subsidy is around the same figure—$50,000,000 annually.

We were told yesterday by our colleague from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] that the petroleum industry alone is receiving a Government subsidy at the present rate of $250,000,000 per year and it is planned to increase these payments to $400,000,000 annually. Think of a $400,000,000 gift to the oil industry on one hand, and on the other hand this proposal to degrade our silver miners down to peon pay and living standards in order that a few selfish jewelers can buy 50-cent silver and a few profiteering bankers can swell their interest yield on unredeemable paper token money.

Fellow Members—we have a grave responsibility in this time of financial stress. We must not be stampeded by a few self-seeking profiteers into undermining the financial structure of our country by destroying the only redeemable money we have.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the Celler amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT to the amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: After the word "purchase" in the Celler amendment, strike out the comma and insert the word "or", and strike out the words "storage, guarding, checking, or transportation."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in order to clarify this situation I am offering an amendment to the Celler amendment. If adopted, the Celler amendment would read as follows:

No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used directly or indirectly during the fiscal year 1944 for the purchase or procurement of silver under the provisions of the Silver Purchase Acts, namely, the act of June 19, 1934, and the act of July 6, 1939, or for the carrying out of any of the provisions of said Silver Purchase Acts.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment will preserve the Treasury's right to store silver and guard it and transport it and check it, because it seems to me that is absolutely essential. I do not disagree with the purposes of the substitute amendment. I know the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has in mind the identical purpose I have in presenting the substitute amendment. However, it seems that, by perfecting the Celler amendment as I have sought to do, we meet the situation frankly and directly.

Just what is this situation in respect to silver? We can hardly discuss silver without taking into consideration the policies in respect to gold and the use of direct obligations of the Federal Government, bonds, as security for the issuance of Federal Reserve notes.

Back in 1934, when these acts were passed, we were faced with deflation, a noticeable appreciation in the value of our currency. We perhaps did not have enough currency in circulation to supply the demand. Now, however, we have too much, and must do an about-face, or we are going to have disastrous inflation in this country. We must repeal the silver acts; we must repeal the gold act; we must repeal the act which authorizes the use of direct obligations of the Federal Government as security for Federal Reserve notes, or this country will enter a chaotic inflation period from which it might never recover. This is the only effective way in which we can reduce the pressure against the inflation ceiling, and I hope it will be adopted.

Just in retrospect, let us see what has happened in respect to silver. A very estimable gentleman named Rene Leon appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency in 1933 and advocated a silver-purchase program as a means of expanding our foreign trade. We asked him in particular about China, a country which has a new nationalism and which is our frontier market today. He said that it would help China. We adopted the silver-purchase proposal. Under that we purchased all of the monetary silver China had, forced China off the silver standard, and forced her to tie to the British pound sterling. Every dollar of trade we have had with China since then has been through the back door of London, England. That is why this amendment should be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, the silver-purchase program of our Government for the past 8 years presents one of the most outrageous frauds upon the taxpayer that has ever occurred and, at the same time, is a monstrous absurdity in its denial of the use of silver for war purposes. It is unbelievable that the special interests of a few of the Western States of our country should have such complete control over these programs which have operated to the disadvantage of the rest of the country, but it is nevertheless the fact.

To arrive at a proper determination of our course of action today, it is perhaps well to trace the history of the origin and operation of the silver-purchase program. Shortly after President Roosevelt took office in 1933, he issued a proclamation directing the mint to buy all domestic silver at a price of 64½ cents an ounce. At that time, the market price was 43½ cents and by the Executive order the silver producers were automatically granted a 50 percent subsidy. A few months later, the Congress enacted what is known as the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 which directed that the Government buy domestic and foreign silver without any limitation as to price or quantity until the ratio of silver to gold reached the point of 1 to 3. A year later, that act was amended to require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay 77½ cents an ounce for domestic silver with no limitation on the price for foreign silver but requiring the latter to be bought. Subsequently, the price was changed for domestic silver by legislative fiat to 71 cents an ounce regardless of the current market price. This is still the law and the purchase program must continue until the open-market price reaches $1.29 an ounce or until there is $1 in silver in the Treasury for every $3 in gold.

At the present time, the open-market price of silver is approximately 35 cents an ounce and the possibility of it reaching $1.29 is ridiculous. The last time silver reached $1.29 an ounce was in 1874 and although the current open-market price is 35 cents an ounce, were it not for our Government purchasing program, the price would immediately sink to 10 cents or 15 cents an ounce.

It is equally ridiculous to expect that our silver purchases will reach the ratio of $1 to $3 with gold. At the time the act was adopted, had we purchased slightly over a billion ounces, this ratio would have been reached, but along with it has been operating the gold-purchasing program so that we are today no closer to achieving the ratio than we were 10 years ago.

The purchase program cannot be substantiated on the grounds of augmenting our so-called good-neighbor policy with Latin America since out of the 20 Latin-American countries, only 2 produce silver in any quantity and even with those countries there is no reciprocal arrangement by which this country obtains some advantage in return.

Through the operation of the silver purchases, we have built up a stock of approximately two and a half billion ounces, the greater part of which lies dormant and unusable in the vaults at West Point. This quantity cost us $2,100,000,000 or an average purchase price of 84 cents an ounce. If the purchase program were to be suspended, it is variously estimated that the open market for silver would be from 10 cents to 20 cents an ounce. Taking the most generous figure as the basis for computation we come to the conclusion that the stocks of silver which cost us slightly over $2,000,000,000 are now worth not more than $500,000,000. In other words, during the 8 years of its operation, the silver-purchase program has cost the American taxpayer $1,600,000,000 and no great benefit or advantage has been obtained except for the few private interests in a few mountain States of the West.

But even more outrageous than the tremendous cost which the program entails is the fact that none of our stocks can be used in war industries, although there are countless ways by which it might be put to work in substitution for other strategic metals. True, a portion has been released for war purposes, but the representatives of the silver States have seen to it that their interests have been protected by attaching a requirement that any silver released for war purposes must be returned to the Treasury in bullion form at the end of the war. The result of this is to circumscribe very narrowly the uses to which silver might be put.

It is time for the representatives of the taxpayers and the public generally throughout the country to speak out their mind in open indignation against the continuance of such a program as this. While the immediate issue before us may not be the proper way technically to correct a bad condition, it is the only way available to us at the moment and should be done if for no other reason than for the Congress at this time to notify the administration of its complete dissatisfaction with this original "baby" of the New Deal.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I hope this committee will not vote on this matter without thoroughly understanding what we are voting on. There is only one issue. The Celler amendment is in effect, when finally analyzed, nothing more than a gesture. The substitute amendment and the amendment to the Celler amendment do only one thing, and that is admitted; it prohibits the payment of a subsidy to the miners of silver. Do you want to do that? That is the question I ask you gentlemen now. Every one of you who was elected, was elected upon the theory that you were coming here to do everything you could for the war effort. A vote for this amendment is a vote to stop the mining of copper, lead, and zinc, whenever it is mined in connection with silver, and about 35 percent of these strategic ores are mined in connection with silver. You have been paying men, who have been mining silver in connection with copper, in connection with zinc, and in connection with lead, a subsidy, and it is absolutely necessary to have so much money for silver in order to mine copper, to mine zinc, and to mine lead. Are you now willing to take the subsidy from silver, and say to these men who are working diligently in spite of the high prices of labor and material, who are struggling to keep their mines open in order to produce these strategic metals—are you willing to say to them we will take these subsidies away from you, although we have been giving you a subsidy for some time, but we will continue to subsidize cotton and we will subsidize practically every other commodity used in the war effort; but in the case of the strategic metals, which we must have to win the war, we will strike down in Committee of the Whole, without any hearing, without any record being made, without having these people given a fair chance to tell their story, without doing this job in a proper legislative manner—we are going to stop the production of the very things that will win this war if it is won, and that is copper, lead, and zinc? We cannot mine these strategic ores unless you pay us a subsidy on silver.

You say in this amendment that we are not going to pay a subsidy on silver; that we are going to strike out of the bill everything of that kind. You gentlemen are far too fair to do a thing like that. Do away with all this monetary talk, do away with all this talk about silver as a money, wipe that off the books, if you want to, but ask yourself the question whether or not, as proper legislators, you are willing, because there is some complaint on the part of the silversmiths in New York not getting sufficient silver, because they have raised a row about it and have a big lobby here in Congress—are you willing to stop the mining of copper, to stop the mining of zinc, to stop the mining of lead, when you know these minerals are necessary in order to win the war? Are you going to do that simply because you are not willing to pay a subsidy on silver when it has to be subsidized so that these other metals may be produced? That is what you are doing, and that is all that you are doing. You can talk about money all you want to; this is a matter of doing a thing that ought to be done in order to carry on this war effort, and you men are all pledged to do that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not true that if this amendment is agreed to it will be of great benefit to the manufacturers of silver jewelry—a nonessential?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Oh, so far as the manufacture of jewelry is concerned, that is not involved. It would not make much difference to them whether this is passed or not, because these people can get what silver they want by paying 71 cents for it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it not rather interesting that Governor Eccles, of the Federal Reserve Board, who comes from the gentleman's own State, who is interested in winning the war also, would like to see these statutes taken from the books?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I regret that my time is up and that I cannot answer your question.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I oppose all these amendments. The silver-purchase question is one close to me personally, not only because I happen to represent a district where this metal is mined very extensively but also because I have experienced throughout my life the effect of the removal of props or supports to industry by the Government.

Fifty years ago, my father started the manufacturing of silk gloves and hosiery in the town of Hornell in western New York. He was one of the pioneers in manufacturing in that part of the United States. Things went well until the Cleveland administration, when the tariff was removed and father was put in competition with the cheaply paid labor of France and Germany. His competitors were strong enough to take their factories to other countries and get other help there. My father finally was forced to sell out and close. This was my first experience with Government subsidies and tariffs.

As a young man I went to the State of Colorado and entered into the cattle-raising business and have ever since been so engaged. But never would I have been able to remain in that business had not there been a tariff to protect me from the importations of beef from Argentina and other countries where taxes, labor, and other costs of doing business were less. Our great livestock industry would be nonexistent, and the consequent development of the West would never have come about without such protection as we have had. This also applies to the beet sugar raised in my State and other farm and livestock products. There is a close analogy between the tariff on manufactured articles and farm products and the question presented by the silver legislation. The Government policy of buying silver from the western mines under the Silver Purchase Act had the simple effect of protecting the miners from the ruinous competition of foreign silver, mined by cheap peon labor. We would be unable to compete, just as we cannot make textiles to compete with those of India or Japan, or beef raised in the Argentine. If it is subsidization to pay our silver miners enough for their product to allow them to mine it, then such subsidization is imperative.

In wartime there is another aspect to the question. If silver were a metal of no strategic importance, if it were of no value to our economy of war or to the sinews of war, I would not be making this plea for the miners who dig it. No industry or class which does not have its contribution to make toward winning the war should have the attention of this body at this time.

Doubtless, most of you have read much concerning the new and varied uses to which silver itself is being put. It is a highly important metal for many war purposes, and it should be supplied in full measure. My colleagues from the West agree that it should be so used, and certainly no impediment should be placed in the way of the Government using all the silver it needs for materials. I am not going to dwell on that phase of the picture, however, because it is my intention to bring out another point with which many of you probably are not so fully acquainted.

Silver ore is not found, in the Colorado mountains, by itself, but is associated with other ores, especially zinc, copper, and lead. All of you know something of the critical shortages existing in copper and zinc. In Colorado, the sources of the zinc, copper, and lead now going into the war effort have been almost entirely silver mines. Silver has paid the bill in the great majority of these mines and without silver they would not now be open. Without the Silver Purchase Act, none of these vital metals would have been produced in a fraction of the quantity presently being mined. The exploration and development of new mining territories would not have been under way and our shortages of these necessary ores would have been desperately acute if not disastrous without this assistance. Withdraw the prop which is suppporting our whole mining program by removing the silver price, and the progress of the war program will be seriously impeded. Any effort toward the elimination of the Silver Purchase Act is a blow at the silver mines of our Nation and because silver is found with copper, zinc, and lead, it would further complicate the already serious bottleneck in our supply of strategic metals.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, I resent the accusations that have been made against the mining industry of Colorado and other Western States by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]. Since coming to this Congress I have formed a high opinion for the distinguished gentleman from New York. I admire his ability and recognize him as one of the leaders here, but I am sure that he did not mean to say what he did this morning, when he referred in unsavory terms to the mine operators of the West. Is it not a rather silly picture in which we find ourselves? Here we are called upon to produce more strategic metals for the war effort. Almost every day the War Production Board is issuing additional orders to promote the mining industry of the West in order that we may have the necessary strategic metals, and here on the floor of this House we have attacks being made on these mining men of the West, who are operating largely with their own capital, who are taking their own chances and doing business with very little return on their investments. This unwarranted attack is being made, not only on the silver industry, but on all of the mining interests of the West.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENOWETH. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I agree with the gentleman from Colorado and I am sure they are honorable gentlemen who are engaged in the silver business. Certainly it does not reflect my views when they may be attacked in their personal character.

Mr. CHENOWETH. I appreciate that. I am sure that such a charge does not reflect the views of any Member of this House, and I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] will strike from the RECORD his reference to the mining people of the West, because there are no more patriotic citizens in this country.

Now, what do we have this morning? We have an attack upon silver. I am no monetary expert. If I wanted to, I could not go into the monetary value of silver and discuss that very elaborate and complicated question in the short time allotted me. We have heard a great deal lately about money and currency and questions have been raised concerning the validity of the currency which we are issuing. This is no time for us to go into the question of the monetary value of silver. I say this is nothing more nor less than an effort to regulate the price of silver. There is plenty of silver for everyone who wants to purchase it, provided they pay 71.11, the price which has been fixed.

I want to call attention to this fact. It has already been alluded to by some of the other speakers. Last year 32 percent of the silver which we obtained in this country was mined, along with what we call other strategic metals and known as complex ores—lead, zinc, and copper. In attempting to strike silver legislation from the books by these amendments you are going to have to consider further subsidies for the copper industry because mine owners cannot afford to produce copper and these other critical materials unless they are able to obtain a fair price for the silver which is found in these ores.

This is a policy that has been established in the mining industry over a long period of years, and now, when we are in the midst of the greatest war in history, when we are called upon to produce these critical materials in increasing amounts, we are having these attacks made. I say this is the wrong time for this to be done. I hope before you vote on these amendments you will stop and reflect upon what you are doing because I am sure this issue has not been accurately presented.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is recognized.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield briefly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In view of the statement made that I had not quoted Mr. Eccles correctly, I want to read again the statement that Mr. Eccles, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, made on March 30, 1942:

> In view of the war situation it is all the more urgent that the inflationary effects of the silver program be removed and that, so far as possible the materials, machinery, and labor now devoted to silver production be utilized in the war effort.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I am sorry; I do not have time to yield further now.

Mr. Chairman, I happen to be a member of the Ways and Means Committee, which is laboring with a tax bill and which will soon be engaged in laboring with another bill which is supposed to raise $16,000,000,000. The purpose of this bill is to drain the spending power of the people through taxation and prevent inflation, as well as to raise money. I believe it is our duty—not only the duty of our committee but the duty of every committee and every Member of the House and every department of Government—to implement the work that is being done by our committee to prevent inflation.

Another thing I believe is that every strategic material should be mobilized for the war purpose. There should be no slacker materials in this fight. Now, let us consider a few questions on that point.

There was exported to Japan from the United States during the period from 1936 to 1940, inclusive, 717,277,918 pounds of refined copper, enough to meet the combined copper requirements to build 179 cruisers, 179 destroyers, 110,805 flying fortresses, 10,680 field guns.

That is only a part of the shipment, because there were over 36,000,000 pounds of scrap copper sent in addition. Now, we are asking the school children to bring their pennies and turn them over to the Government. What is that exported copper now doing? It is fighting our soldiers in the jungles, on and under the water, and on foreign battlefields. It is being used to fight against our own flesh and blood. What have we in the way of a substitute? We have this silver buried at West Point. The time has come for that to go out and fight the materials with which we armed our enemies. Not only that, we cannot afford to fight a war on two oceans and to fight inflation as well. We talk about preserving the American way of life. Well, if there is anything that will destroy the American way of life it is inflation, and we are facing it. The spiral is going up all the time. There is a demand for increased wages and salaries, and prices will leap again. In no country where there has been inflation has it ever been possible for the increase in wages to keep pace with prices under an inflationary program.

So the time has come now, when we are stripped of copper and must substitute silver, when no man who really feels patriotic should take issue with the importance of putting this silver to work and replacing this copper to help save our boys on the battlefields.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] is recognized.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to say to the gentleman from Colorado that I am sorry for any intemperate remarks that may have been attributed to me. In the excitement of debate sometimes one may say things one would not otherwise say. I hope I shall be forgiven for any indelicate remarks I may have made.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CELLER. I will yield if it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to know how it is that a Member having already spoken 10 minutes under the 5-minute rule now gets an extra 5 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. I am speaking on an amendment to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that two amendments are pending to the original amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. The Chair assumes the gentleman is speaking in opposition to or in favor of one or both of these amendments.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered to my amendment by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT], for I feel that it strengthens my amendment. I have an abiding affection for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]; I respect his judgment on all occasions, but I do believe his substitute amendment would be weak. I therefore hope that my amendment as modified by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan will prevail.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It might be a good idea to straighten out the parliamentary situation. As I understand it, the vote will come first on the Wolcott amendment to the Celler amendment.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I agree with the gentleman from New York that if his amendment is implemented by the Wolcott amendment it will go infinitely further than mine, and be a pretty good one, I may say.

Mr. CELLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the Wolcott amendment is adopted, I have no choice. It makes no difference to me whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York prevails or my substitute.

Mr. CELLER. I hope, then, that the committee will accept the Wolcott amendment, which strengthens my amendment, because while either the amendment or the substitute may be only a gesture, it is a mighty powerful gesture; it is, in common parlance, "a sock on the jaw" that we willfully deliver to those interests that are standing in the way of the war effort.

I ask you to listen to what a former expert of the Treasury Department, Mr. Bratter, an expert on silver, said:

If freely used in airplane and other engines, that Treasury silver would help the Navy sweep the Japs from the seas. If freely used in making vital parts of tanks and trucks, that silver also would help the Army annihilate Hitler. Put in searchlight reflectors it would help protect our skies. But buried at West Point, that silver is just a monument to folly. It there lies like a prisoner of the Axis, deferred from the draft by a couple of old monetary laws.

The War Production Board made the following statement, under date of December 26, 1942, in answer to questions propounded to it:

In accordance with request for information on the need for silver in the war program, we are submitting the following information conforming in general to the outline followed in the questions which you asked us to answer:

Any discussion of the possible contribution of silver to the war program must differentiate between the consumptive and nonconsumptive uses for this metal. Consumptive uses represent applications where the ownership of the metal changes hands and where it will be difficult to recover the metal at a later date in either the quantity or the form in which it was supplied. Nonconsumptive uses refer primarily to concentrated applications such as bus bars where title to the silver is retained by the United States Treasury Department, and the silver will be returned to the Treasury in the same form and quantity at the conclusion of the war emergency.

The discussion immediately following applies to consumptive uses of silver:

1. Question. If Congress made silver available to industry at a price not over 50 cents an ounce, would the opportunities for using silver in the war effort be greater than the available supply of Treasury silver now on hand?

Answer. Assuming an available annual supply of not more than 5,500 tons (2,000 tons domestic and 3,500 tons imported) we believe that the demand which would result if Congress enacted legislation guaranteeing the availability of silver at 50 cents per ounce would exceed the available supply.

2. Question. Is a shortage of cadmium holding up the use of silver for war purposes? If so, will that condition continue?

Answer. A shortage of cadmium is not necessarily a real restricting influence on the potential use of silver for war purposes. Sufficient cadmium is presently availabl for alloying with silver to the extent that the use of cadmium is now required for silver brazing alloys for war purposes. By a simple specification change the percentage of cadmium required to do the same work can be cut by one-half or two-thirds so that twice as much brazing can be done with the same amount of cadmium. Furthermore, by substitution of silver for cadmium in a small portion of the electroplating, a large amount of cadmium can be made available for brazing alloys. The new lead-silver solders require no cadmium whatever.

3. Question. What are the other war uses for silver which do not "bottleneck" through cadmium?

Answer. The following is the potential annual demand for silver in military and essential civilian applications (excluding decorative arts) if silver were freely available:

Detailed list of estimated rates of the use for war production and essential civilian use at end of 1943

[Millions of ounces]

| Use | Probable demand | Potential use |
|---|---|---|
| Engine bearings | 50 | 100 |
| Brazing alloys | 25 | 35 |
| Electrical contacts and wiring | 25 | 25 |
| Photographic and chemical | 15 | 15 |
| Electroplating | 5 | 15 |
| Lead-silver (soft) solder | 3 | 10 |
| Dental and medical | 3 | 5 |
| Miscellaneous | 50 | 50 |
| Total | 176 | 255 |

In addition to these specific war production requirements, there are other demands upon us—notably foreign coinage—which will bring total requirements to be filled out of supply available to us to considerably more than the totals listed above.

4. Question. For what strategic and critical metals would Treasury silver prove most useful as a substitute?

Answer. Copper, tin, cadmium, and nickel. The opportunities for substituting silver for copper are most promising because of its similarity to copper in electrical properties. Silver has already proved satisfactory as a substitute for tin, copper, and cadmium in engine bearings and for tin in soft solders. Silver has substituted satisfactorily for nickel and cadmium in electroplated coatings.

The following apply to nonconsumptive uses of silver:

5. Question. How much silver could be used in nonconsumptive form (such as bus bars), but not limited to bus bars, if we assume that the entire monetary stock of silver is released for such purposes?

Answer. Approximately 20,000 tons of silver had been certified by the War Production Board to the Defense Plant Corporation up to the end of 1942 for use as bus bars or transformer windings in new aluminum and magnesium plants, thus releasing practically an equal amount of copper for cartridge brass. A comparatively small portion of the above material represents replacement of existing or fabricated copper conductors, while most of the silver earmarked for nonsumptive use is going into service as a substitute for copper in new aluminum and magnesium plants. The aggregate tonnage of copper now installed as bus bars and other heavy conductors in power plants in this country far exceeds the total Treasury-owned silver stock of approximately 112,000 tons. All of the so-called free silver and silver held as backing for Treasury certificates could probably be utilized on a replacement basis for protected installations in power plants in the United States and Canada during 1943.

6. Question. As between giving the War Production Board power to (a) designate the use of Treasury silver for nonconsumptive purposes, and (b) designate its use for both consumptive and nonconsumptive purposes, which would be most helpful to the war effort?

Answer. It would be more beneficial to war production if the Congress authorized the use of Treasury silver for both consumptive and nonconsumptive purposes.

7. Question. What industries could use silver in consumptive form immediately?

Answer. (See answer to question 3.)

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, for many years this silver proposition has been before the House. First we tried to stop it entirely, and then we tried to stop only the purchase of foreign silver; but you must remember that this proposition involves, if it goes along, not only the purchase of domestic silver but the importation of the useless-to-us foreign silver in large and growing quantities. Foreign countries have been able by expediting and stepping up the mining of silver to crowd onto us their silver which means that we have paid for a good portion of their economic living system.

It is time our folks woke up; it is time we stopped with the silver subsidy. The time has come when there is a high enough market for copper, lead, zinc, and those other metals of which silver is a byproduct that the mines can produce for the war effort without considering silver as a factor of return; and it is time we voted to stop the purchase of silver by the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, your Subcommittee on Appropriations is not taking a stand on the merits or demerits of the provisions of the Silver Purchase Act. I do call attention to the fact that what will be done by the adoption of either the substitutes or the original amendment will be to repeal an important policy of Congress and a substantive provision of legislation.

Both of these amendments should be defeated, and I will tell you why they should be defeated. They should be defeated because there is a growing feeling in the House that the Appropriations Committee seems to assert legislative authority, which is the farthest from the intent of that committee. It is a bad practice to insert legislative provisions in appropriation bills. These amendments should be defeated because their defeat will protect the integrity of the appropriating functions of the Appropriations Committee, and will help to preserve the line of jurisdiction between the legislative committees and the Appropriations Committee.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] told the House that he had a bill before the Committee on Ways and Means that would do "a real job" of repealing the Silver Purchase Acts. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] also told the House that he had a bill before the Ways and Means Committee. The proper way to approach this subject is through the legislative committees. The gentlemen recognized this fact when they introduced repeal bills and had them referred to the Ways and Means Committee.

Let us not confuse and destroy the differentiation between the appropriating functions and the legislative functions by legislating on an appropriation bill. It is likely to do incalculable damage. I ask the committee to vote down this amendment for these very good and substantial reasons.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that the Congress has the right to put limitations upon appropriation bills under the rules of the House?

Mr. LUDLOW. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TABER. And that is the opportunity presented to us at this time?

Mr. LUDLOW. Undoubtedly, and if that were not the fact I should have offered a point of order. This amendment is legislation in the guise of a limitation, but it is a limitation nevertheless. It is not subject to a point of order. After all it is for the Committee of the Whole to decide whether or not it wants to continue these acts. I simply say that by so doing you are striking a blow at the integrity of the appropriation functions of the House and you are helping to confuse the two committee jurisdictions. You are helping to make it possible in the future that the legislative functions will be taken over by the Appropriations Committee. There is a right way and a wrong way and this is the wrong way to do what many would like to see done. This is a bad precedent and therefore this amendment and substitutes should be voted down.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Has all time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; all time has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the first vote will come on the Wolcott amendment to the Celler amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. After that has been disposed of, the vote will recur on the substitute that I have offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Wolcott amendment which we are about to vote on be reread.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will rereport the Wolcott amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk reread the Wolcott amendment to the Celler amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WHITE) there were—ayes 111, noes 103.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. WOLCOTT to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 163, noes 117.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to the original amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW) there were—ayes 0, noes 10.

So the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW) there were—ayes 146, noes 114.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. CELLER and Mr. LUDLOW.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 166, noes 103.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREIGN FUNDS CONTROL

Foreign-owned property control: For all expenses necessary in carrying out the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury under sections 3 and 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended (50 U. S. C. (App.) 3, and 50 U. S. C. (Suppl. 1941) 5 (b)), and any proclamations, orders, regulations, or instructions issued thereunder, including personal services (without regard to classification laws), printing, and reimbursement of any other appropriation or other funds of the United States or any agency, instrumentality, Territory, or possession thereof, including the Philippine Islands, and reimbursement of any Federal Reserve bank for printing and other expenditures, $4,100,000.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 4, line 10, after the comma, strike out "$4,100,000" and insert "$3,100,000."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to save what in these days is a small amount of money, $1,000,000, on the appropriation for the Foreign Funds Control.

Since the last appropriation for this purpose there has been established the Alien Property Custodian, and to the Alien Property Custodian have been transferred all the business activities and the business properties and the patents that were formerly under the control of the Foreign Funds Control. The Foreign Funds Control formerly had $5,000,000 to spend. The Alien Property Custodian now has $5,000,000 to spend. The Foreign Funds Control at the present time has the job of looking after the bank deposits and the securities, only, of foreigners, and of going into foreign countries where our forces go and taking possession of and setting up a control over the foreign-owned funds in those countries. The major part of their work has been taken over.

The Budget reduced this item $650,000, the committee reduced it $250,000 and I propose to reduce it $1,000,000 more, bringing it down to $3,100,000.

At the present time this organization has on its pay roll 1,400 employees, with a pay roll of $4,350,000. The Alien Property Custodian has a pay roll of $5,000,000. Both these organizations wanted the whole job, but to keep peace in the family two separate organizations were created, although one is all they ought to have.

What I have allowed here, $3,100,000, is plenty of money for them to do a good job. I do not believe that in making our appropriation for any agency of the Government we should give them more money than they need. This organization does not need more than $3,100,000. I am hopeful that we will start in some way to reduce the excessive number of civilian employees of our Government by cutting this item from $4,100,000 to $3,100,000. The reduction involved is a small one, but it paves the way for future savings.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if we reduce this item as indicated we are coming very near to interfering with operations that have become absolutely essential as a result of the war. This agency gave us a great deal of off-the-record testimony to the effect that it has been required to send a good deal of its personnel into north Africa on account of taking over the situation there.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. The number of 6 went to north Africa out of 1,400.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the gentleman is in error about that. I think it was considerably more than six. Anyway it was indicated that many more will have to be sent later.

Mr. TABER. No; I am not in error. That was the number.

Mr. LUDLOW. At any rate, it is opening a field that requires special attention and that promises to require a great deal of personnel in the high brackets. The transfer of Foreign Funds Control personnel to Africa has only started.

Further, it was testified that this is just the beginning of the possible requirements overseas, because if the United Nations invade Europe it will immediately mean a vast expansion of the field of the Foreign Funds Control Service in taking over operations in the occupied territories.

This activity has already been reduced very drastically. In a general way, I may say that it covers 35 countries. The funds of 35 countries have been taken over in the operations of the Foreign Funds Control. The total amount of this property is $8,500,000,000. It is an enormous operation. This appropriation cannot be cut any further than the Budget and our committee have cut it without interfering with most important and vital operations, especially in view of the fact that undoubtedly there will be an invasion of Europe, which will require a vast expansion of the service immediately. These are matters that have to be taken care of immediately when the situation arises. There is then no time to build up an organization. We do not know when or how quickly the picture will change; we do not know when the invasion will take place, and we do not know when additional personnel will be required far beyond the scope of the appropriation we have carried in this bill.

No one is more consecrated to economy than I or the other gentlemen on this side of our subcommittee, but these things ought to be done within reason and with a thoughtful contemplation of what we are doing here. This amendment would be a very ill-advised operation on this appropriation, and it would have a most serious repercussion. I ask that you vote down the amendment.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. Does not this agency have in its care and custody property of kinds other than money?

Mr. LUDLOW. The business enterprises have been transferred to the Alien Property Custodian, but there is a vast operation here in dealing with money and securities. It has most extensive ramifications, not only in this country but all around the world. This operation will be immensely and almost immediately expanded as a result of our military operations. I appeal to the patriotism of the House not to do something that may interfere most vitally with our war program.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Committee will vote down the amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 146, noes 121.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. TABER to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 178, noes 115.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of loans: The indefinite appropriation "Expenses of loans, act of September 24, 1917, as amended and extended" (31 U. S. C. 760, 761), shall not be used during the fiscal year 1944 to supplement the appropriations otherwise provided for the current work of the Bureau of the Public Debt, and the amount obligated under such indefinite appropriation during such fiscal year shall not exceed $57,000,000 to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct: Provided, That the proviso in the act of June 16, 1921 (31 U. S. C. 761), limiting the availability of this appropriation for expenses of operations on account of any public-debt issue to the close of the fiscal year next following the fiscal year in which such issue was made, shall not apply to savings-bond transactions handled by the Federal Reserve banks for account of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HENDRICKS: Page 12, line 22, after the word "Treasury", strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of William Pickens, Frederick L. Schuman, Goodwin B. Watson, William E. Dodd, Jr., Paul R. Porter, John Herling, Paul F. Brissenden, David J. Saposs, Maurice Parmelee, Harold Loeb, Sam Schmerler, Emil Jack Lever, David Lasser, Tom Tippett, Henry C. Alsberg, David Karr, Guiseppi Facci, David Wahl, Hugh Miller, Walter Gellhorn, Karl Borders, Jack Fahy, Nathaniel Weyl, Robert Morss Lovett, Merle Vincent, Alice Barrows, Arthur F. Goldschmidt, Marcus I. Goldman, Leonard Emil Mins, Henry T. Hunt, Mary McLeod Bethune, Harry C. Lamberton, T. A. Bisson, Katherine Kellock, Jay Deiss, Milton V. Freeman, George Slaff, A. C. Shire, and Edward Scheunemann."

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment provides for the refusal of payment of salaries to individuals whose salaries are not provided for in this appropriation bill and, therefore, that the amendment is not germane. Further, I make the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins will he yield to me?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to make a point of order upon an additional ground, and I think possibly the gentleman from Florida may desire to discuss that also.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would be very glad to have the gentleman make his point of order.

Mr. FOLGER. Then I make the point of order that the amendment is divisible. Thirty-eight or forty names are included within the amendment, and I make the point of order that it is out of order for that reason. Each one must be taken separately. It is a divisible amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] let me admit that the amendment does include more than one name, that it includes the names of those who would not be directly affected by the appropriation at this time. I admit that, but I do not admit that it is not germane because of the fact that this appropriation may be used to hire anyone that the Treasury or the Post Office Department desires to hire. An appropriation bill originates in the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives has the right to put any limitation upon the appropriation that it desires. If the Treasury Department and the Post Office Department each has the right to hire anyone under this bill, then we have the right to put in the names of people in this bill that they cannot hire.

So far as the second point of order is concerned, that this is legislation on an appropriation bill, I am sure that the gentleman's contention will not hold, because we have identical language in other appropriation bills to which the point of order has been made, and the point of order was not sustained.

So far as the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina is concerned, I do not think that that will hold good, and I ask the Chair to rule on the point of order.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. CASE. Does the amendment that the gentleman has offered attempt to deny the use of funds in any other appropriation bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, no; the amendment applies only to this particular appropriation bill.

Mr. CASE. It applies only to the funds carried in this bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The amendment is limited to the funds carried in this appropriation bill.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. MASON. And the only point of order that can be raised is that this is legislation on an appropriation bill, and inasmuch as the amendment is nothing but a limitation on the funds that are under consideration in the bill, then the gentleman's amendment is in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair rules permit me to cite to the House the same provision in another appropriation bill which we passed in 1941. At that time we were working on the W. P. A. appropriation bill, and I refer the Chair to Public Act 143, Seventy-seventh Congress, where this provision is contained in the bill:

Provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of David Lasser.

To that provision, the point of order was raised, and was not sustained. That is the exact language I am using in this amendment.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard for a moment upon the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order that the amendment is out of order, because it is divisible and I insist on a division, voting on one at a time and not voting just in a lump on these 30 or 40 people about whom we do not know anything, in 1 amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY). With respect to the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], amendments of this character have been inserted in appropriation bills heretofore. The amendment simply limits the appropriation. If Congress has the right to appropriate, Congress, by the same token, has the right to limit the appropriation.

With respect to the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FOLGER], the Chair would say that when it comes to voting on the amendment, should the House so desire, the amendment is divisible and a separate vote could be had with respect to each individual name.

So the Chair is constrained to rule that neither point of order is well taken, and therefore both are overruled.

The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, since this is an important subject and I have quite a file, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the Members for a few moments, I want to first state why I added the names of these other people to the one which appears first, that of William Pickens. Heretofore we have called the attention of various departments to the fact that the Dies Committee and also Attorney General Biddle have looked into the records and affiliations of certain employees of theirs and we have asked them to take them off of the pay roll. In some cases they have been taken off. In other cases we have been completely ignored in our request, and I could give examples of those cases, but I do not want to take the time.

I do want to give you a few examples of what has happened. In the bill that I just cited to you, which we were working on in 1942, we included a provision that no portion of the funds could be paid to David Lasser. Let me tell you where David Lasser is at this time. He was taken off of W. P. A. pay rolls, but at this time David Lasser is now in the War Production Board as senior economist at a salary of $4,600, whereas he was only getting $4,400 when we put that provision in the bill. Let me give you a few other examples.

On March 28, 1942, the gentleman from Texas, Chairman DIES, wrote a letter to Hon. Henry Wallace, Chairman of the Board of Economic Warfare, calling his attention to the Communist affiliations of eight of his employees, and made particular reference to one Maurice Parmalee principal economist of the B. E. W., at a salary of $5,600 a year. Mr. Parmelee had written several books advocating the practice of nudism in America. Two days later Parmelee was dismissed from the B. E. W. He was reemployed, however, on November 2, 1942, at the Railroad Retirement Board as an economist at $4,600 a year.

In 1938, David J. Saposs, chief economist of the National Labor Relations Board, was exposed by the Dies committee, and in 1939 by the Smith committee, investigating the N. L. R. B. As a result of these exposures David J. Saposs was dismissed from the N. L. R. B. He was later reemployed as an economist in the Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, and just recently appointed assistant to the chief of the labor division of the War Production Board at a salary of $8,000 per year.

In 1938, Henry G. Alsberg was director of the Federal writers project of the W. P. A. This project was exposed by the Dies committee as being a tool of Communist propaganda, and in 1939 the House abolished the agency, which automatically removed Alsberg from the Federal pay roll. Alsberg has recently been reemployed by the Federal Government and is now senior feature writer in the Office of War Information at $4,600.

In 1935 Sam Schmerler was dismissed from the F. B. I. on account of his Communist activities. Several weeks later he was employed by the Social Security Board, and has worked there ever since. At present he is employed as a policy consultant at a salary of $3,800 a year.

I have called your attention to the fact that Mr. Lasser is now with the War Production Board.

One other case:

In 1941 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], in a letter to the President, exposed the Communist affiliations of Emil Jack Lever, then employed in O. E. M. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] was never advised as to what action was taken against Lever; however, he is now employed as head labor adviser in the War Production Board at $6,500.

So you can see, Mr. Chairman, that no matter how we may call it to the attention of the heads of the departments, in some way or other these men are going to get around, they hedge hop from one department to the other. That is the reason I have offered this amendment, including the names of every one of those men whom the Dies committee has said had communistic leanings or views which were unfavorable to our form of government. I propose, if this amendment is adopted, to offer it on every appropriation bill that comes before this House, and if we adopt this amendment on every appropriation bill, then there will be no place else for these men to hedge hop.

I think the time has now come for the Members of this House to make one decision. We authorized the Dies committee in 1938. Since that time that committee has spent $470,000 in their investigation work, and I think they have done a good job. There will be a resolution coming before this House to continue that committee for 2 more years. They will probably ask for $75,000 more, which will make a sum total of $545,000, over a half a million dollars. From time to time they have submitted these names to the heads of the departments, and from time to time they have sent them to Congress, and they have asked us to take action, but we have never done it. I have heard Members say, "Well, something ought to be done, but this is not the way to do it." I have never heard one of them say how it should be done or how it was going to be done, and I have never seen it done. This is one effective way that it can be done. I say we should decide now whether we are going to do it, whether we are going to take the word of the committee for which we have appropriated $545,000. If not, then when this committee comes back for additional authorization and another $75,000 we should determine that it is not serving any purpose and discontinue the committee. That is the reason I offered this amendment, to give the House an opportunity to decide.

Now I want to go into the question of the one man who will be affected particularly by this bill, William Pickens. According to the Daily Worker of October 3, 1933, William Pickens was the speaker who followed Earl Browder at the opening mass meeting of the United States Congress Against War. The single quotation attributed to Pickens in this news story in the Daily Worker was significant and was as follows:

> To take the profit motive out of war we must take the class-profit opportunities out of our economic system.

Does that sound like the capitalistic system or communism? I leave it to you. Here is the Daily Worker, here are the headlines telling of a great meeting they held here:

> Resolve unyielding struggle against war, fascism, and for defense of Soviet Union.

Earl Browder spoke and then Pickens spoke. Let me say to you here that Pickens has denied any communistic activities and at times he has said he did not even know that these organizations were communistic. I want to point out to you, however, that if Pickens is worth $4,600 a year to the Government he is intelligent enough to know when he is in the wrong sort of company. The Daily Worker of October 3, 1933, carries William Pickens as a member of the national committee of the American League Against War and Fascism which was set up by the United States Congress Against War. The American League Against War and Fascism, later known as the American League for Peace and Democracy, has been branded as subversive by the Attorney General, Mr. Biddle.

I open another folder here of the Daily Worker in which Pickens' name appears as a member of that committee. There is his name right there, and I shall be pleased to give you these papers and let you look at this at any time.

I want to give you just a little further information. There was a publication, Fight, which has also been branded as subversive—fight against war and fascism—and as co-vice chairman on the masthead of that publication are William Pickens and Earl Browder. There is the company that Pickens is keeping. I could go on and give you more and more; I am not going to try to give you all of it; you can decide for yourselves what kind of company he is keeping. I want to give you just one or two more instances. According to the New Masses, a Communist weekly, for November 14, 1939, William Pickens was scheduled to deliver a lecture at the Workers' School at 35 East Twelfth Street, New York. The Workers' School is an arm of the Communist Party.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. In closing, I want to say I hope the Members will investigate this file and decide for themselves whether he is a Communist or not.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I am a Republican and I have no sympathy with the Communist Party or with communism as we know it. I have great admiration for the way the Russian armies have been fighting the Allied cause, but I do not share the Communist point of view. I think it most unfortunate, however, for this purge amendment to be presented at this time, listing some 30 or 40 names of persons who are generally unknown to most of us. I read critical reports about many of you at campaign time. You were called everything imaginable—I have been—and I imagine some of the utterances of your opponents if used here would not make very pleasant reading. I do not want to be a party to the crucifying of persons without giving them a proper hearing, and condemning them, not only as employees or prospective employees of the Government, but as American citizens. I do not like this sort of thing; it is not American and it is not tolerant. In fact it fosters intolerance. As a Member of the Congress of the United States I would be ashamed to support an amendment like this. Take the case of Mr. William Pickens, who is secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. I understand the F. B. I. and the Secret Service have investigated him and have given him a clean bill of health. Now, regarding the Daily Worker, I have been quoted as some of you have been quoted in the Daily Worker. It is entirely probable that some of you have been headlined in the Daily Worker right alongside some outstanding Communist.

All of us have been maligned by our political adversaries time and again. I have been called a Communist, a reactionary, a rebel, a Socialist, a radical; I have been called everything under the sun, and so have you. Have you forgotten the last campaign when so many Members of Congress were attacked as Nazis and Hitlerites? How about Mary Bethune, whose name also appears on this purge list? She is a prominent colored lady who has done a great deal for her people. I do not want to vote for an amendment which includes her name as an undesirable citizen.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that all of us will be temperate, that we will act wisely here, that we will act in keeping with the Christian point of view. We are told that we are fighting for the "four freedoms." We talk about all these blessings. We have established a republic here, a government for, by, and of the people that Abraham Lincoln so feelingly portrayed. His birthday will be celebrated next week. I have too much respect for the memory of Abraham Lincoln and that which he represented to vote for this amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

Mr. Chairman, regardless of this amendment I do not believe this is a good time to create strife and disunity among ourselves and our allies, if it were possible to do that in this country. All we have to do is to read the newspapers and see the kind of a hellish war this country is engaged in, on every sea, on every land, and in the air over every country. I realize that the cream of American manhood is dying every place for you and for me and for our country, and the very moment that we of this Congress do anything that will throw a doubt in their minds as to what those boys are fighting for, you may lengthen the time of this hellish thing in which we are now engaged.

Suppose these men have had communistic leanings? Who in the name of God today are stopping bullets that would be killing your boys and my boys and the boys of every other father and mother in this country were it not for the Russians? You may say they are fighting their own fight, and maybe that is true, but nevertheless every German that they kill is one we do not have to kill.

We are making an awful mistake here today, to adopt this amendment. We made a mistake the other day when we denied membership on a committee to a Member of this House because it was claimed that at one time he had a leaning toward communism. We should not take a single step to cause dissension or destroy, if you please, not only the Democratic Party but perhaps ourselves. The Republicans cannot lick the Democrats, but we can lick ourselves. Our enemies cannot lick the United Nations, but, remember this, we ourselves can lick the United Nations if we are not careful. This is no time to bring up matters of this kind. This is no time for making speeches that might destroy us.

Quoting Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower:

> We must all realize that we are fighting a touchy war and everything we do, day and night, must be directed toward the winning of that war.

I remind you once more of getting the word spread of my attitude toward irresponsible talk directed at any one of our allies * * * in unwarranted criticism of any ally we are playing into the hands of the Axis.

I have refrained many times during the present session of Congress from saying what was in my mind upon certain subjects, but I feel this is not the time. Every word and every act must be directed toward winning the war. I feel a loyalty to my country, I feel a loyalty to our boys who are giving up their lives, and they are making the sacrifices. We are not, compared to what they are doing.

I agree with the gentleman from Ohio. In addition to all that I have said, this is conviction without trial. It is not in accordance with the American tradition of fair play and trial by a jury of your peers.

Do you want to brand somebody that you do not know anything about on hearsay and by ex parte proceedings and say he is a Communist? I want you ladies and gentlemen here today to think these things over that you are confronted with and make up your minds what we are doing. The thing that is uppermost in the mind of every human heart in this country is to win this war. That is our job which we have to do. Every time we delay the day of victory for 1 minute or for 1 hour we are rendering a grave disservice to our country and to our boys.

This amendment should be defeated. I appeal to the Republicans and I appeal to the Democrats to defeat such amendments as this. Who are we fighting—Russia or Germany?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman seriously appealing to this House to resent the suggestion or the proposal that these communistic rats that have been gnawing away at the foundation of constitutional government be put out of office?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will answer the question.

Mr. COX. Just what is it you have in mind?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no more use for the so-called rats than the gentleman from Georgia has.

Mr. COX. Why this special plea for them then?

Mr. O'CONNOR. My answer is this: My country comes first with me; the winning of the war is first; and if I do anything that is going to create disunity in this country or among our allies, I think I am rendering a disservice to my country. That is my answer. We can later take care of the undesirables.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I think it is time to clear some of the dust out of our eyes and find out what the issue involved here is. The sole and only question involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida is whether one man, an employee of the War Savings Staff of the Treasury Department, should be taken off the pay roll. That is a Negro named William Pickens.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida is, in my opinion, one of the most peculiar pieces of legislation ever presented to this House. It proposes that no part of the money carried in this bill shall be used to pay the salaries of 40 persons, 39 of whom have no more connection with the Treasury Department than the man in the moon.

I have just picked up from my desk a resolution which authorizes a General Pulaski Memorial Day, October 11. The gentleman might just as well have offered his amendment to that bill for all the efficacy it would have. There is no money carried in that General Pulaski bill, and there is no money carried in the Treasury Department appropriation bill for these 39 employees. So it all simmers down to the one question, and that is whether one individual named William Pickens shall be dispossessed of his job in the Treasury Department.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Should he lose it?

Mr. LUDLOW. I think not, and I will tell the gentleman why.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I have a very limited time only.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Even though the others are not affected by this Treasury Department appropriation, if we do not adopt this amendment, they will be in there sooner or later.

Mr. LUDLOW. No; it has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WILSON. Is it not true that, if this man is thrown off the pay roll in this Department, he can be taken on in some other department, as was the case with David Lasser? And is it not true that, if the other 39 are not eliminated now from being paid from this appropriation, they can, if they are taken off the pay roll of some other department, go right onto the pay roll of this Department?

Mr. LUDLOW. I have to say to my beloved colleague from Indiana that his question answers itself, I believe. Of course, there is nothing to prohibit the appointment of anybody in any department. It might be true or it might not be.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I cannot yield further, because I want to direct myself to the question asked me by my friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox]. He says, Do I think this man should not be thrown off the roll? I say definitely that I think he should not be, for two reasons. In the first place, the Treasury Department denies categorically everything that has been said to the detriment of this man, and the Treasury Department is his employer. That is one reason. The other reason is that I do not believe any man should be thrown off of the roll in this off-handed way when we are the judge and the jury and the executioner, without any evidence whatever to support such action.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Should Communists in the first instance be put on the rolls?

Mr. LUDLOW. Of course not.

Mr. COX. If they are on the rolls, should they not be put off?

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has not heard what I have to say about the merits of this man. It is denied that he is a Communist.

Mr. COX. Of course, he will deny it.

Mr. LUDLOW. The Treasury Department, which is his employer, denies it; and I think some respect and credence should be given to the report of the Department on this man. It has sent me a letter which with the permission of the House I shall now read. The Treasury Department investigated William Pickens through its very strict investigatory service conducted under Mr. Irey, and he is a real investigator, equal to J. Edgar Hoover, I will tell you that. He goes to the bottom of these things. I have Mr. Irey's report on this man and I have a letter from the Treasury Department, which states that he is a loyal citizen of the United States, and an efficient and faithful employee. This letter is from Harold N. Graves, assistant to the Secretary, and it reads as follows:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LUDLOW: In accordance with your request, I am glad to supply the following information about William Pickens—

Bear in mind, he is the only man involved here. Nobody else is involved out of these 40 named. None of them has any connection in the world with the bill before us, except William Pickens—an employee of the War Savings Staff of this Department, who has been named, among others, by Congressman DIES as disqualified for employment in the Federal service by reason, it is assumed, of alleged membership in a political party or organization which advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States.

Mr. Pickens, himself a Negro, is in charge of a small section in the War Savings Staff, whose function it is to assist in the promotion of the War bond program among Negro organizations throughout the country.

I understand he has done a most valuable work in the sale of government securities.

Mr. Pickens was first employed in this capacity in May 1941, and since that time his principal duty has been to appear before colored groups in different communities with a view to inducing the participation of the Negro people in the war-savings program, and with a view to the establishment of special war-savings committees among the colored people to encourage them to invest their savings in War bonds.

Mr. Pickens has performed these duties to the entire satisfaction of this Department.

He has been diligent and successful in his work, and he and his small group have done much to bring about an understanding of the war-savings program on the part of the colored people and a steadily increasing participation by them in that program. In the period of his employment by this Department, nothing has transpired which would suggest that he is anything but a patriotic American, completely loyal to the traditions of this country and to its established form of government.

Mr. Pickens is a man with a distinguished record for work among the colored race. Our files show that he was born at Anderson, S. C., on January 15, 1881; that he is a graduate of Yale University and a member of Phi Beta Kappa; that he taught at Talledega College, Ala., from 1904 to 1914; that he was dean and vice president of Morgan College, Maryland, from 1915 to 1920; and that from 1920 to 1941 he was an officer in National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People, upon whose recommendation he was given employment in this Department.

As is well known, the statutes prohibit the employment in the Federal service of any person who advocates, or who is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence. As early as October, 1941, the Dies committee record concerning Mr. Pickens was brought to the attention of this Department, and an investigation was at that time made by the Treasury Intelligence Service to determine whether Mr. Pickens' employment was in contravention of the law. I quote the final paragraph of the report which was submitted to this office upon the conclusion of the investigation.

I beg your particular attention to the report of the Secret Service of the Treasury Department on this man. I quote as follows from that report:

This investigation has disclosed that William Pickens is now employed as a promotional specialist with the Defense (now War) Savings Staff and is entirely satisfactory in this capacity; that numerous references have been made in the Dies committee reports to his name without actually connecting him with any subversive organization; that he is exceedingly well recommended by his superiors and associates; that his character, reputation and loyalty to this Government are reported to be good; and that he is well qualified and suitable for the position he now holds with the Defense (now War) Savings Staff.

Mr. Graves concludes his letter by stating:

As you will see, this department has long been aware of the charges made by the Dies committee regarding Mr. Pickens. It will be appropriate to say that we are convinced that they are without any substantial foundation; and that we are satisfied that Mr. Pickens is completely loyal to the Government of the United States.

The Treasury Department and its Secret Service Branch under Mr. Irey give this man a splendid recommendation.

We are surely not going to adopt an amendment here that would do a tremendous injustice to a worthy employee who has been found to be loyal and faithful to this Government and who is doing a fine service for our country in promoting the sale of bonds to win the war.

I ask you to vote down the amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, were my action in reference to the pending amendment to be motivated by emotion or hate, I would perhaps support it. The very voices that are now crying out against the adoption of this amendment, however are the voices that in the last campaign vilified me because of my pre-Pearl Harbor votes. These are the same men who speaking here today, are crying for tolerance.

As one who for many years was a public prosecutor, I say to you that never in that public service did I adopt the attitude that a person accused of crime was by virtue of that accusation alone guilty. I have always believed that a person accused of acts reprehensible or criminal in character is entitled to a fair trial and the right to face his accusers and make a defense. So I believe this Congress and this Committee of Congress have acted very wisely by incorporating the general provision in this very bill which you will find in section 302, and which reads as follows:

SEC. 302 No part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall be used to pay the salary or wages of any person who advocates, or who is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence: Provided, That for the purposes hereof an affidavit shall be considered prima facie evidence that the person making the affidavit does not advocate, and is not a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence:

Now listen to this. This is what demonstrates that your Committee and the Congress of the United States believe in democracy and believe in not pre-judging and convicting an individual until he or she has had an opportunity to have a fair trial in a court of justice:

Provided further, That any person who advocates, or who is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence and accepts employment, the salary or wages for which are paid from any appropriation contained in this act, shall be guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

Now, then, there we give the expression of this Congress of a determination to uphold and maintain the real spirit of democracy. We say to any person, if you have proof that will stand in any court of law that William Pickens is a Communist or advocates the overthrow and destruction of this Government by force and violence, and he has filed an affidavit in order to take employment that he is not such an individual, then if perchance in violation of the terms of that affidavit you still believe that he is a Communist or that he is a member of an organization that believes in the overthrow of this Government by force and violence, you may take your proof to the proper United States district attorney and ask that an indictment be rendered against that individual. He will then be brought before the court charged with violating the law which I have just read. Then, if he is convicted he will be removed from the pay rolls. Thus you will have preserved the very essence and the spirit of democracy, and you will have given to every man charged with a crime the opportunity for a fair trial—a trial that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to every person. Mr. Chairman, even those despicable Nazi spies were given a fair and impartial trial before their execution. We are fighting to preserve constitutional government and democratic processes and not to emulate Hitler; and so, despite the fact that I am recognized not only in this Congress but in various parts of the country as one who has raised his voice time and time again against the infiltration of subversive elements on the pay rolls of the Government, I still will not destroy my faith in the democratic process by not giving an individual who is inferentially accused of a crime, an opportunity to be heard in a court of law. Let the accuser produce his evidence, and let the accused produce his evidence, and upon conviction he will not only be removed from the pay rolls but he will be forever stigmatized as a felon.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that the Congress of the United States has no power, or that it should not use its purse power to take anybody off the pay roll unless he is guilty of a felony?

Mr. KEEFE. Oh, no; I am not taking any such position as that. I am not disputing the power of the Congress of the United States to take anybody off the pay roll; I am not disputing the power of the Congress of the United States to take a thousand people off the pay roll. And may I say that I am certain that the wheels of justice should be made to turn more rapidly and I am sure that when the facts are properly presented perhaps more than a thousand people should be removed from Federal pay rolls. The Congress of the United States undoubtedly has that power, but when an accusation is made against an individual, such as the accusation that was made against me in the last campaign, the mere making of the accusation does not in itself demonstrate a fact. Mr. Speaker, if I were guilty of the accusations made against me in the last campaign by people who claimed to be responsible, I would not be fit or worthy to sit among free men and women in this great legislative assembly. Those accusations were made. I knew, and the great majority of the voters in my district knew, they were false. I knew that I could successfully make my defense at the bar of public opinion. I did so and the voters returned their verdict. How bitter I would have been had I been denied a chance even to answer my accusers. My colleagues, can't you see the point? I despise this gang of saboteurs that are endeavoring to destroy our system of government, and I say to you I would remove them all from the Federal pay roll. In their removal, however, I want the democratic process observed and not indulge in Hitler or lynch process. I want to accord that right to every citizen, no matter how high or how low he or she may be, or whether I may be in complete opposition to his or her views. In so acting, my fellow Members of Congress, we will be practicing the virtues that we are shedding our blood to defend, the virtues of real democracy at home.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman does not believe, in further answer to the question of the gentlewoman from Illinois [Miss SUMNER], that this Congress should go on record as branding somebody as a criminal without a trial.

Mr. KEEFE. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to make the further observation that I was branded just the same as was the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] by the New Republic as being an agent of the Nazi government, and all that sort of thing. Therefore, I have no reason other than I stated for my position in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. KEEFE. I remember well the situation that existed in this country at the time of the last war. I know how emotions can be whipped up, and I feel that we should act deliberately in this matter with full knowledge of what we are doing. Under no compulsion of emotional appeal should we here destroy the very democratic process we are committed as a nation to defend——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, a member of the committee.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] if he voted for the amendment to the W. P. A. bill which eliminated the name of David Lasser from the payment of those funds carried in that bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR rose.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, I will ask the gentleman from Montana to hold that just for a minute please. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I entertain some disconcert of spirit about the pending amendment. Several vital considerations are involved. If the Committee of the Whole should vote down this amendment today, it would appear to the country that we have nullified in one sense the work that the Dies committee has done. If, on the other hand, we approve this amendment, I fear that we do prejudge men without a fair trial. There are 38 names on this list. There are 4 names on this list that I would strike from the public rolls today, because I have heard the evidence in respect to them. Gentlemen will remember that 3 years ago I offered the amendment by which David Lasser was taken from the rolls. That action was sustained by the Senate. I did that, however, only after I had made what I thought was a substantial case against David Lasser.

He interviewed at least 100 Members of this House, but he never came to see me. I invited him and he came 3 times, and he admitted in the course of our conversations that I had done him no injustice on this floor.

I could vote today on David Lasser, but he is not on the Treasury pay roll. I could vote on Henry Alsberg, but he is not on the Treasury pay roll covered by the pending bill. I could vote on David J. Saposs, but he is not covered in the pending bill. There is only 1 of the 38 who would be affected by the pending appropriation bill. The remainder are in a state of anticipation and would be kept off of the rolls in case they were ever in some future period employed by the Treasury Department, and that future period would be limited to the fiscal year 1944.

I think we would be making a mistake to adopt the pending amendment, but I think on the other hand there is a way of solving this difficulty. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FOLGER] has indicated that he will ask for a division of the question and under the rules he can do so. He can ask for a separate vote on every name on this list, because the fate and destiny of 38 separate and distinct individuals is involved. If so, there can be 38 votes on this amendment.

I would suggest to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] that this is the wiser course: Let us vote on the one name affected by this bill, William Pickens, and then let us adopt some language that will meet the situation of which the gentleman from Florida complains.

After I had made some effort to secure the separation of David Lasser from the Federal pay roll I found that he had been lodged in another spot. When I secured the separation of Mr. Foss from the public pay roll, from the Rural Electrification Administration, he was hired by the Board of Economic Warfare, and then upon subsequent investigation he was separated entirely. That will be the wiser course, to deal only with the only person affected by this bill, and later I will offer an amendment which will read substantially as follows:

> No part of any appropriation or authorization in this act shall be used to pay any part of the salary or expenses of any person, the payment of any part of whose salary or expenses from other appropriation or authorization is prohibited by any other act; but this prohibition shall be effective only during the period for which such prohibition in such other act is effective.

In consequence, we can deal with William Pickens today. When the supplemental or deficiency appropriation bill comes before the Congress, which contains the name of David Lasser and others, we can deal with them then. When the independent offices appropriation bill comes before the House, which contains the appropriation for the Federal Communications Commission, where Goodman Watson is employed, we can deal with him at that time By the adoption of this generic language it will be impossible for him to hop from one pay roll to another.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman has forgotten that unless this amendment before the House is adopted, the gentleman from North Carolina cannot call for a separate vote on any one of these people, because it only makes it possible when this amendment is adopted. I agree that the gentleman has given language that will cure the problem that confronts us without naming these men, but I do want to remind him of the fact that unless this amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] is adopted, no gentleman can call for a separate vote.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. TABER. A division of the question would have to be before the vote on the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is my opinion of the matter.

Mr. Chairman, I raise the parliamentary question now as to whether the question will be divided before the vote is taken on the amendment, so that there will be a vote on every individual name as they are demanded by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the division is made before the vote on the amendment is taken.

Mr. DIRKSEN. You are therefore apprised by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House that there will be a division of the question before the vote is called. If the gentleman from North Carolina persists in his request, he can have 38 divisions of the question.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON. As I understand the gentleman's position, he does not hesitate to vote on certain individuals with whom he is familiar?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. JACKSON. How can the gentleman expect Members of the House who are not acquainted with the background of these people to vote, or how can he expect or request the Members of the House to vote when they are not familiar with their background?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think in answer to the gentleman, and it is a very proper question, that he will find that when the various appropriation bills are reported from time to time, the subcommittees will provide the background of every one of the gentlemen involved. We had the same thing last year in connection with Goodman Watson. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr STARNES] raised the question about him, so that question was decided on this floor.

So I shall offer this general language later and let us deal only with one gentleman, Mr. Pickens, now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to see if we can reach some agreement as to time for debate on this amendment?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I am as strongly opposed to keeping Communists on the Government pay roll as any Member of this House could possibly be. I have supported every appropriation for the Dies committee and expect to vote for its continuance. At the same time I do not want to participate in any legislative lynching of men who have simply been charged with communistic affiliations without the submission of adequate proof to sustain the charges.

I want to direct your attention to one of the men on this list. I do not know about the great majority of them but on this list is the name of Harry Lamberton, who is connected with the legal counsel for the Rural Electrification Administration. About 2 years ago the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] published the name of Mr. Lamberton as a member of a Communist organization. After that Mr. Lamberton was before our Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations and we were, of course, interested in determining whether he was a Communist or not. We questioned him regarding this charge. He said that he had never been a member of the organization in question, that he never had participated in its work in any way and that he had no sympathy with it. I advised the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] almost immediately after that of the statement made by Mr. Lamberton. He insisted that his committee had complete evidence to demonstrate that the man was an active member of this organization. I asked him to supply it for the use of our subcommittee. He has not done so. On last Monday he published the name of this same Mr. Lamberton in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a member of a certain communistic organization. I saw him immediately after his speech and said to him:

Our Committee on Agricultural Appropriations is just as interested in getting Communists out of the Government as you are. If you have evidence to show that Mr. Lamberton is a member of this organization, we should like to have it.

The gentleman from Texas very kindly promised to send to me a transcript of his committee's evidence, but until this good moment he has not been able to do so. I do not know whether he has the evidence or not. I assume from his statements that he must have but certainly I do not think this House ought to act upon the basis of a charge which has not so far been supported by the submission of adequate evidence to determine its truth or falsity. I feel that our subcommittee charged with the duty of preparing the appropriation bill out of which Mr. Lamberton is paid ought to hear evidence and determine whether or not from that evidence they believe Mr. Lamberton is a Communist, and if they so determine take adequate steps in the preparation of that bill to see that his connection with the Government ceases. I believe I am justified in speaking for the committee and saying that if such evidence is disclosed, the committee will take appropriate action; but until evidence of that character is produced, in view of what has transpired, in view of my request of the gentleman from Texas—and he is sitting immediately in front of me and knows those requests were made—and in view of the fact that so far he has failed to submit to our subcommittee evidence of Lamberton's membership in this Communist organization, certainly it seems to me this House would be going a long way today on an appropriation bill which does not carry any money for Mr. Lamberton or for his employment, to put a restriction in it providing that he shall not be paid any funds from the Treasury or the Post Office Department appropriations bill upon the basis of his alleged communistic leanings.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] is present. If he desires to take issue with anything I have said I shall be pleased to yield to him.

Mr. DIES. I may say to the gentleman from Georgia that the proof of Harry Lamberton's affiliation with and being an officer of some two or three Communist organizations is a matter of record in our hearings where he testified himself, admitted under oath and under subpena produced the records of the organizations which are part of our hearings.

Mr. TARVER. Yes; but answer this question: Did I not, 2 years ago, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations, ask the gentleman to submit evidence showing he was a Communist?

Mr. DIES. The gentleman did.

Mr. TARVER. Did I not ask the gentleman last Monday again to submit such evidence?

Mr. DIES. The matter is of public record in hearings that are available to every Member of the House.

Mr. TARVER. Did not the gentleman promise to send that evidence to me?

Mr. DIES. The records of the committee are always available to the gentleman. I will see that he gets the evidence.

Mr. TARVER. Then let us wait before passing on the case of Mr. Lamberton until the appropriate subcommittee having jurisdiction has heard the evidence. I think that is fair, and I do not believe anything else would be fair.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, my question has just been answered. I yield back the minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I think our colleague from Florida has performed a splendid service in bringing this issue directly to the floor of the House. I have said to the House upon a number of occasions that my idea of handling not only these 38, but some 1,200 in all, is for us to have the opportunity to present the evidence to the Appropriations Committee and let the Appropriations Committee weigh the evidence and then take immediate steps to dismiss these people from the Federal service.

Insofar as the names submitted to you by the gentleman from Florida are concerned, the evidence will be found in my speech. If you will read my speech delivered last Monday you will find that in many instances I quoted from the language of the man nimself. There is not any question, in my opinion, that these people are not fit for public service, but they are merely a drop in the bucket.

All that we can possibly ask, and what I want the House to do, is to assure us of immediate action on this whole question. So far as I am concerned, for some years I have been pointing out that on the Federal pay roll were people who had subscribed to ideologies foreign to our country, people who belonged to organizations that are subversive. We have failed to obtain adequate action.

The gentleman from Florida said that he was going to force this issue in the House in the hope that the House would do something. Heretofore we have been unable to get action. The only recourse that any Member of the House has is to offer an amendment similar to the one that the gentleman has offered. Insofar as I am concerned, I would prefer that the Appropriations Committee hear not only these 38 but the whole 1,200 and take action, but up to this date we have no assurance that will be done. Since that is the fact, and since there is no other recourse open to me and to other individual Members of the House, I shall vote for this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin stated that this problem had been solved by the Appropriations Committee by including in the bill section 302. I want to read section 302 and say emphatically that is not a solution of the problem, and I want to point out why it is not.

Section 302 reads as follows:

No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the salary or wages of any person who advocates, or who is a member of an organization that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence.

There is no person on the Federal pay roll today who advocates the overthrow of this Government by force, or who will acknowledge he advocates that, but there are many who advocated it in past years. I want you to get the difference. The question that you have to decide is whether John Jones, who 5 years ago with his own language, his own writings, his own associations and everything advocated it, but the same John Jones on the Federal pay roll today says, "I am not a Communist; I do not advocate the overthrow of the Government by force; therefore I am not a Communist." There is the point—"who advocates or who has advocated in the past."

Every one of these 38 have advocated that in the past. Their records will show it. They do not advocate it now and they can sign that affidavit saying, "I do not advocate it, I am not a member of that organization," and they cannot be brought before a court on perjury charges, because who can testify as to whether they themselves still advocate it? That is the whole sum and substance of this question.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman offer an amendment to cure that situation?

Mr. MASON. I think the amendment that is going to be offered by the gentleman from Illinois will take care of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI].

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, I am a Democrat from Detroit, Mich. I represent a great industrial area. I have the privilege of being not only a Michigan Democrat, but I have had the privilege of going down to Alabama when I was a boy 7 years of age. My father bought a farm of 160 acres down there. I was raised in the South. I played around with Alabama boys, and I went to school with them. I have always had a great admiration for men of the South ever since I came to this Congress. I voted for John McDuffie for Speaker of this House, a great leader from Alabama. I have the greatest respect for men like Joe Byrns, Bankhead, and our present Speaker. They are real Democrats. They are the men who are making our party great. They are men like Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson. They were not men brought to the party with provincial ideas, with hatred and prejudice. The great leaders in our party are men who have built up our party in the opposite direction.

It hurts me, it grieves me, to sit here and see other men from the South, that I respect, playing what I think is petty politics, purely district politics, provincialism. That is not going to make our party great.

The Democratic Party has a great job to do. We do not have a great majority, and we are not so powerful. We have got to be a great party, we have got to be a liberal party, we have got to be a progressive party. We have to represent everybody. The Democrats of Detroit, Mich., who work in those factories, have to be represented by the Democratic Party here, as well as the cotton planters. Some Members of Congress may have some of the old ideas that were brought about by some of the misleaders of democracy who did preach hatred and things of that kind. We do not want appeals to hatreds and prejudices.

We have a great job to do. We must do that job. We have a great leader. We have a great President. We have a great man down here in the White House. The Democrats better stand together. We better fight to win this war, we better start fighting Mussolini, Hitler, and Tojo.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FOLGER].

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this is a nonpolitical or a nonpartisan question with me, I do not hesitate to take my stand on this side of the aisle. I do not know a single person on this list. I did not know until I was told here in the House that the first man named on that list of 38 or 40 people is a member of the Negro race, and I do not care about that. What I am opposed to is charging, trying, condemning, and punishing anybody without a trial, and that is what I regard this proposed action here today.

I am going to have to vote against the proposed resolution or amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Illinois, if he offers it. He may be able, and I doubt not that he is, to pass on the question that he made mention of here, but if I did it as a Member of this Congress and sitting as a juror, I would have to do it upon hearsay evidence. They tell me that there is only one man now, and that I did not know, who would be immediately affected by this amendatory legislation, and that he is a Negro by the name of William Pickens. I do not know but that there are men listed in these 38 names who are now in the armed service of the United States.

What I am opposed to is relegating to a denial of consideration the provisions referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] that are ample. If a man swears that he is not in favor of the overthrow of this Government by force or violence, and it is found out that he does adopt such thought, he is then guilty of a felony. He will be tried in the orderly way.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote against every part of this amendment because I do not feel that it is a proper thing for us to legislate in that way and virtually try men—38 of them together—in this fashion. If we cannot get that stricken out altogether, next I will ask for a division in order that maybe one man who might be in the armed service today instead of employed by the Government somewhere may not be stigmatized by what we do on this occasion. I am opposed to the whole thing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, I did not count the number of names mentioned in this amendment. The number has been variously referred to as 38 or 40. Debate has been limited to 30 minutes. That would be less than 1 minute per person, if the debate were devoted to a consideration of individuals, which, of course, it will not be. I cannot condemn people unless I know something about them. I have voted for continuation of the Dies committee before, and I expect to do it again. It has done good service and will do more. But I cannot condemn 38 individuals without knowing something of the evidence on each of them. I do not even know that each of these persons would be condemned by a majority of the Dies committee. I do not understand that more than one or two of these persons has ever had a hearing. Of most of them we know nothing.

Some years ago I served on a Federal grand jury. I have never forgotten the charge the old district judge gave to the members of that jury as we assembled for the first time. He told us something about the history of the development of Anglo-Saxon justice. I am perfectly willing to vote on a case where the evidence is clearly before us and the issue is joined, but I am not willing to condemn 38 men and women in 30 minutes on ex parte presentation without even a specific statement on each one of the individuals concerned. We are supposed to be fighting a war to sustain the Anglo-Saxon idea of justice. Let not this legislative body today give the lie to that by such a procedure as is here proposed. As has been suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER], I cannot believe that Abraham Lincoln would vote for the proposition now before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, during the last several years of the life of the Dies committee I have made but one speech regarding it, and it contained very few words. I said, "I hope the committee will be continued until all the Communists in the country have learned to say, 'Never say Dies.'" That was a remark indicating that I favored the continuation of the committee.

Almost the entire membership of this House rose and cheered the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] the other day. Certainly we seemed to have approved his findings. Am I today to be told that each case must be proved before each and every member of the Committee on Appropriations before the findings of the gentleman from Texas and his committee are accepted?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] has robbed me of a part of my speech. Section 302 is indeed worthless, useless verbiage. No matter what views a man held yesterday, if he certifies that he is loyal today, he must be considered pure.

I want only loyal people in this Government, especially these days. Is it wrong that a man should be challenged because he has belonged to subversive organizations? Is it necessary that he advocate the overthrow of this Government by force and violence? Shall he be accepted if he only hisses and thumbs his nose at the Government? That is not violence, is it? If he raves and insults us, is that nothing? How easy for him to escape punishment, or even to be employed by that same Government.

How I appreciate these lawyers. I have no emotion or hatred as stated by others. I did not know a colored man was involved. But you have heard these lawyers today. Thank God I am not a lawyer. I can look at things with some balance, I think, but a lawyer wants a jury. He accepts no ex parte accusations. Are documented statements from a House committee exactly in that category? But the lawyer likes the trial proceedings: "When the cause goes hard the guilty man excepts and thins the jury all he can." Is not that illustrative? They attempt to claim there is some truth in section 302. Ridiculous! We can read and interpret even if we are not lawyers. If the usual forms of trial were used, treason would have to be proven against such men before you could separate them from the Government pay rolls.

Somehow I feel that I should support the Dies committee or vote to abolish it. That is mainly the question involved. They were the ones selected by us to make these determinations. They have documented their evidence. What more can they do? If they have not proven an impartial jury, let us do away with them. After such a recent demonstration of confidence in them, why now hesitate to accept their recommendations?

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I think any American who believes in our form of government and a fair trial and justice as we know it cannot on an ex parte hearing condemn any man of a crime. I have had the privilege of serving as a prosecuting attorney, and I know I would not like to be on a jury and listen to the evidence submitted by the prosecution, refuse to permit the defendant to be heard and present his evidence, and then be compelled to render a decision. That is exactly the situation that is presented here.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not true that if these men are severed from the pay roll it does not mean they are even charged with any crime, it does not mean we have condemned them, and it does not mean we have tried them. The average man on the street knows these bureaus are run by Communists or that they have communistic influences, and he does not want us to appropriate money to further that course.

Mr. JACKSON. I am sure the gentleman understands that we are not sitting here as a grand jury today, I hope. The gentleman should know that by this action we will be branding these men in public print as such, and that while they are not charged specifically with a crime, perhaps, to all intents and purposes they will be branded as such and their reputation destroyed. The gentleman knows that as well as I do.

The most elementary procedure that could have been followed here was that these men should have a right to a hearing and notice thereof. Were these men subpenaed before the Committee on Appropriations and given an opportunity to present their case? All I am doing today is appealing to your fairness and sense of justice to all, whether we differ with them or agree with them. That is what we are supposed to be fighting for, among other things.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. KLEIN].

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with everything that has been said by the previous speaker. I would be willing to say that if I were convinced, if we were all convinced of the fact that these people are Communists that possibly such action should be taken, but I submit that it was never the intention of anybody who voted for the extension of the Dies committee to give that committee so much power. We do not know what evidence has been brought to bear, nor what evidence has come out to show that these people are Communists. We do not know whether the accused had an opportunity to cross-examine any of the witnesses, or be represented by counsel. It does not seem to me fair or just, simply because a man's name appears on the list of the Dies committee, or because Mr. DIES or a member of his committee has called him a Communist, that we should find him guilty and deny him employment by the Government, or that money should not be appropriated to pay him where he has been employed. I do not believe anybody ever intended to give such power to the Dies committee. Such action is a departure from our democratic form of government. If we had some way of actually finding out the facts it would be a different situation. I would be inclined to agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] that if sufficient proof was brought before us, then some action should be taken, but I submit in all fairness and in all justice that this is no way to do it. It is very easy these days to sear the reputation of a person by the branding iron of war hysteria. It is just as easy to call a person a Fascist or a Nazi as it is to call him a Communist. Because he is called a Communist does not necessarily establish the all-important fact that he is one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL].

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, here is another one of those old prosecuting attorneys. I want to ask a question before you gentlemen on either side criticize my vote, if I vote. I heard a name read here whose people I have known all my life. His brother is the commander of the American Legion post at home. His mother has the blood of Nancy Hanks flowing in her veins, and those people have lived in that community for four or five generations on both sides of the house, and never before have I ever heard their loyalty questioned, their patriotism or their public spirit, on any proposition. This man was educated at the Transylvania University. He was educated for a Christian preacher Now, I am to be asked to vote very shortly on a conviction or an acquittal. Thus you see that I would not be able to cast a vote without more information, for I am unwilling to vote on hearsay testimony against a friend and acquaintance. Unless you take the vote separately on each name, I shall be compelled to vote against it all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. How many other speakers are concerned in this matter?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 4 more minutes remaining, and two more speakers.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Then somebody else will be denied the right to speak if this consent is granted?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I have 2 minutes granted to me, and I yield those 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr' CREAL. I do not care to accept them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we are all in thorough sympathy with the purpose of this amendment. I do not think there is a Member of the House who would take issue with the purpose sought to be attained by the amendment, but that question is not directly presented here. The question immediately before us is the penalizing of 38 men of whom we have never heard before, and here for the first time called to our attention by this unexpected amendment.

My good friend from North Carolina says that it is in effect an arraignment, a trial, a judgment, and an execution all in one, but on closer scrutiny, it has more the appearance of a lynching bee. The proposal here is that these men be given short shrift. It smacks of the procedure in the French Chamber of Deputies, during the Reign of Terror.

Mr. Chairman, the House is no place for a trial of that character. To deprive men of civic rights in this summary and arbitrary manner, without notice and without opportunity to speak for themselves, is one of the most serious and drastic actions this body could take. This is neither the place nor the time, but there are means by which the matter can be properly and appropriately reached. The gentleman from Texas suggests that it be submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, where charges can be heard and where the accused be given opportunity to reply. That would be in keeping with American institutions. Under our law every man is entitled to his day in court, and if the matter is brought regularly to the attention and jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations the committee will be glad to hear it. I make this response to that suggestion contingent with the concurrence and approval of the minority members of the committee, and shall be glad to have an expression from the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the ranking minority member of the committee.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I will cooperate with the gentleman in every way in having a full hearing, if the matter is presented to our committee.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I simply rise to say to the gentleman from Missouri that the independent offices appropriation bill will be on the floor of the House next week. Several names which have been under investigation and discussion by the Dies committee are on the pay rolls of some of the agencies in the independent offices appropriation bill. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES], a member of the Dies committee, is a very useful member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Independent Offices. In line with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], those names were discussed with the several agencies, evidence taken on them, and I am sure when the bill comes to the House there will be a record that the House can act upon intelligently if it wishes to do so and not be called upon to act upon a great many names that we have never heard about before.

I trust the House will permit that procedure to prevail.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Let me appeal to the Members of the House to follow orderly procedure. Let us not lose our sense of perspective.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, under the rules of the House, after debate is once fixed, it cannot be changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman correctly states the rule.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HENDRICKS moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized on the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Florida must be in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is in writing.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is already a motion before the Committee, namely, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida, which must be acted upon before any other motion is considered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I simply point out to the Chair that this is a preferential motion, which takes precedence over all other motions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled and the gentleman from Florida is recognized.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I hate to take the floor again, but I have been here for 6 years now, and I am now beginning my seventh year. Practically ever since I have been here I have heard Members of the House, not only on the left side but on the right side—Democrats and Republicans—cussing the "bureaucrats and blockheads and damn fools" in the departments. I have also heard the Dies committee come in here and give us the names of people who should be removed. As I have before pointed out, we have given the Dies committee over $500,000. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] made his report to this House the other day and submitted the very names that I am giving you today every Member of this House rose to his feet and cheered, showing their confidence in the Dies committee.

Today, when I submit those names for you to take action, what do I find? Not only my chairman, whom I greatly respect, but the leaders on both sides saying, "This is not the way to do it." Every time we have attempted to do something about these people who we are convinced are Communists somebody has said, "There is another way to do it." As long as I have been here, I have not seen that other way to do it. I have been asked by Members on both sides to withdraw this amendment and to submit one name. I am going to submit the one name if this amendment is not adopted, but I am going down fighting on this one amendment. I am not going to withdraw it. As far as I am concerned, I am going to let the Members of this House take the responsibility.

Members stand here and tell me that they are convicting them without trial. Why, Mr. Chairman, they have convicted themselves by their own associations, and I challenge any Member of this House to take this record of William Pickens and carry it back to your people and tell them that you voted to keep him in the employ of the Government, and try to be reelected. Here he is. For your benefit you have the advantage of the files of the committee. I say that if you want to see whether this man is guilty or not look at these files and I challenge you as I submit the evidence of these files to say he is not.

We talk about the provision of the existing bill. I want to point out two things. You know what that provision is. Let me tell you what the Communist Party had to say about it, their instructions to their people as to what to do under circumstances of this kind. They would just as soon lie as not; they will give an affidavit that they are not Communists and come right in and get a job with the Government. Here is what they say:

The tactics to be assumed under police examination must be much more elastic than that. But the fundamental principle remains the same: No statements incriminating any comrade, no names, no addresses, not a single fact which could possibly be used directly or indirectly against the party, its organs, or individual members of the organization. No explanations in this respect. Absolute denial even when personally confronted with the persons and despite the evidence given by police spies and agent provocateurs. Whoever infringes, even but a little, these fundamental rules must instantly and mercilessly be ejected from the party.

Let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I am going to vote for this amendment. My leaders, my chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] whom I admire very much, said we had a way to get at this. We had an instance of that last year in the case of one Goodwin Watson, whose name was brought before us and whose case was acted upon in this House. We kicked him out of the Communications Commission, we thought, but he is still in the Communications Commission. That is all that happened.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman has made a preferential motion——

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am stating why I am against the bill and I am going to keep on stating it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking on his motion, as he has just said that he is going to vote for his own amendment. He is not therefore speaking to the preferential motion which is to refer the bill back to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The preferential motion is part of the amendment itself and the Chair thinks the gentleman from Florida is well within his rights.

The point of order is overruled.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As to these promises that other means will be used to get rid of these men, to get them off the pay rolls, I do not believe that. I am going to stick to this one thing and then my record will be clear. If these men are found on the pay rolls at the end of the year you take your responsibility; I am taking mine today.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short observation?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I cannot yield for an observation; I have only 5 minutes. I am sorry.

Mr. Chairman, I hope we shall deliberate very carefully and without any emotion in voting on this amendment that is presently before the Committee. I do not have to say for those of you who have served in this Congress with me or for those who may care to look at the record that I have voted without exception in support of the Dies committee; I have voted not only to sustain the committee but to appropriate funds for its work. I think it has done some very fine work. I yield to no man in an utter disgust at the manner in which some bureaus and agencies have continued to hold on to people who have been investigated and who have been demonstrated not to be suitable for the Federal service; but, Mr. Chairman, the Members are being called upon here today to take a remarkable action. Only one man in this list is directly and personally before you. The committee bringing in the bill has had no hearings whatsoever on the subject; nobody has appeared before the Committee and suggested that this man was unfit for the public service. The only thing you have is the ex parte statement of the chairman of the committee.

I should like to ask if there is any reason why the Dies committee cannot bring in a bill to this House setting out the names of 1,200, 700, 500, or 38?

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Not just now.

They could set out their names and assert that they are unfitted for public service. Then we should have an issue before us that we could pass upon, evidence, and could decide what should be done as a matter of general policy. The Appropriations Committee is presently setting up machinery whereby we shall have the advantage of some investigators. We are going into these matters. Two or three of these names were called to the attention of the Subcommittee on Independent Offices. We had hearings on them, and I can say to the Committee here today that as a result of those hearings one of the men discussed is either already off the pay roll of the Government or will be before the bill is reported to the House.

Mr. MASON. That is not enough.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That may not be enough, but I may say to my friend from Illinois, who is a very useful member of the Dies committee, that if it is not enough when we bring in the independent offices bill, he can raise the issue while that bill is being considered; he can bring it up and discuss it.

I have no quarrel with this Committee today if it takes off the pay roll any man in this bill we are considering, because I think that is an issue properly before us. I do think, though, you should have given this subcommittee a chance to consider the matter. When you go beyond that and bring in a motion that no one has considered, that is something entirely different, and I venture to say that there are not 25 men on the floor of this House who know one scintilla of fact about any of these names.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. Has not the Dies committee considered this matter with almost $500,000 of the people's money? Has the gentleman read the report? Every Member of this House should. I think the fault is they have not read it.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Well, why can they not bring in a bill here and make that a direct issue for the House to consider?

Mr. CHURCH. The report of the Dies committee is here and has been here for days.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman knows that our committee has no right to report a bill?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. We ought to give you that right. The House should give you that right. The House ought to give you the right to bring in legislation. I think it is idiotic to set up a committee to do that kind of work and then not implement it with authority to bring in legislation.

Mr. DIES. We have introduced some four or five or six bills, and that was the end of the whole matter.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. My friend has turned over to me a file containing certain information mentioned in a speech he made the other day and it is going to have the consideration of the Appropriations Committee. Every one of these things will have consideration. I want to appeal to the House today not to go on record in this manner.

Mr. DIES. If we will bring to your committee the records in writing of 1,200 men, will the gentleman give us time to present the cases against these 1,200 men?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. They ought to be presented in connection with the bills involving the various departments in which they are working.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the preferential motion offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the enacting clause stricken out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is simply on the preferential motion, not on my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN to the amendment offered by Mr. HENDRICKS: Strike out all after the name "William Pickens" in the Hendricks amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired on this section and all amendments thereto.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the Committee divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 137.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. HENDRICKS to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 146, noes 153.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman in order in offering this amendment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is a separate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say that the gentleman from Florida may offer another amendment, but there can be no debate on the amendment, because debate on this section has been closed.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has no right to debate the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Was debate closed on the section?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Debate was limited on the section and all amendments thereto, and that time has expired. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HENDRICKS: On page 12, line 22, after the word "Treasury", strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of William Pickens."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. MARCANTONIO) there were—ayes 159, noes 102.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. LUDLOW.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 163, noes 111.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES

Salaries: For personal services in the District of Columbia, Office of the Treasurer of the United States, $2,940,000: Provided, That with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, there may be transferred (not exceeding a total of $410,000) to this appropriation and to the appropriations "Printing and binding, Office of the Treasurer of the United States" and "Contingent expenses, Office of the Treasurer of the United States," from funds respectively available for such purposes for the Agricultural Conservation and Adjustment Administration, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Tennessee Valley Authority, Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Federal land banks and other banks and corporations under the supervision of the Farm Credit Administration, Railroad Retirement Board, Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, United States Maritime Commission, Agricultural Marketing Administration, Farm Security Administration, National Youth Administration, Federal Housing Administration, Federal Public Housing Authority, Commodity Credit Corporation, and corporations and banks under the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration, such sums as may be necessary to cover the expenses incurred on account of such respective activities in clearing of checks, servicing of bonds, handling of collections, and rendering of accounts therefor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: On page 13, after line 22, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"No part of any appropriation or authorization in this act shall be used to pay any part of the salary or expenses of any person whose salary or expenses are prohibited from being paid from any appropriation or authorization in any other act."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall take just a moment to explain that this is the proposal I suggested to the committee earlier in the day. It would prevent an individual who had been interdicted from being on the Federal pay roll from hopping from one department or agency to another. I recall that on several occasions that has happened. After the House had passed upon an individual and ejected him from a department or agency pay roll, we discovered in a subsequent period that he was in some other agency. The net purport of this language is that once the Congress has taken him off the pay roll he cannot play hide and seek in the Government and turn up in some other spot. This amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the language of the gentleman's amendment cover a prohibition that we may put in a later act that may be passed?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right; if the payment of his salary is prohibited by any other act hereafter passed, then he cannot be transferred to this particular pay roll in the Treasury Department.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, what I shall say may seem somewhat of an anticlimax.

As much as I may hate and despise the conduct of certain individuals, and however reprehensible their conduct might be, I question the right of Congress to legislate in the manner which is now attempted regarding the rights and privileges of certain selected and named individuals. The right to hold public office is an inherent right in the citizenship of this great Republic. It is an inalienable right. Certain restrictions have been placed upon the right to hold public office and those restrictions will be found in the fundamental and organic law of the land. Certain age limits have been provided. My recollection is that a citizen must have reached his twenty-first birthday before being qualified or eligible for membership in this House. I believe that the minimum age for membership in the Senate is 30 years and for the office of President it is 35 years of age.

In addition to these limitations we have placed another limitation upon the right to hold the highest office in the gift of the people, that of the Presidency of the United States. In addition to being 35 years of age, the President must be a native-born American citizen. A naturalized citizen cannot be President of this country. Likewise, we have laid down certain rules and regulations and enacted certain laws governing the conduct of individuals and provided that the breach or violation of certain laws which have been enacted may deprive an individual of his American citizenship and may disqualify him to hold public office. A person tried and convicted of treason or certain other high crimes and felonies may lose the right to hold public office, the sacred and inalienable right with which we are now dealing. We may provide other limitations and set other standards and establish other formulas, but such limitations and standards and formulas must be applicable to all of the people of this Nation. We cannot place burdens upon selected and named individuals which impair the integrity of their citizenship. We cannot convert this forum into a trial court. We have no right to make inquiry into an individual's political philosophies. We neither indict, try, nor convict individuals in this Chamber. Even a Communist might legally be elected to membership in this body.

Our Government tolerates no discriminations against individuals on account of either race, color, or creed. While I would like to free this Government of every incompetent, inefficient, and unpatriotic, crackpot bureaucrat, I believe that I appreciate fully the limitations upon the power vested in each Member of this House. We still have a Constitution. We still have a democratic system. We still have three separate and distinct branches of government.

My objection to this suggested limitation or legislation is fundamental and far from superficial. Personally, I should like to see the President arrange immediately for the discharge of every unpatriotic person who is now employed in the executive branch of the Government. We create agencies, clothe them with power, and set them in motion, but the entire responsibility for the success or failure of such agencies to function rests with the Executive. We neither hire nor fire the personnel. We, of course, may withhold appropriations. We, of course, may abolish the agencies we have created, but we cannot, in my opinion, constitutionally enact a law which will prevent Tom, Dick, and Harry from holding office.

Let us consider a hypothetical case. Let us suppose that the President has selected and named an individual as judge of the Supreme Court or of one of the inferior courts, and let us suppose that the Senate has confirmed the appointment of the person nominated by the President. Then let us further suppose that the House takes unto itself the authority to sit in judgment upon the action of the President and the Senate and specifically withholds the entire salary of the individual who has been nominated and appointed a judge and has entered upon the performance of his judicial duties. Do you believe that the courts of this country would hold that act to be constitutional? Of course, I do not think that such a thing would happen. In the first place, if the Senate had confirmed the appointment, it would not, in all probability, agree to the withholding of the salary, but if the House had taken such a position it would be plain to see the ridiculous situation in which we would be placing ourselves. Let us further suppose that the President should appoint one of the individuals listed in the amendments offered here today to some responsible position, either in the legislative or judicial branch of the Government. Could we by an act of Congress, either directly or indirectly, nullify the act of the Executive? Could we by an act of Congress deny the well-earned salaries of General MacArthur, General Eisenhower, and other many brave generals and officers who are now engaged in the grim and grave business of winning this war? We have our own responsibility and that is quite enough. The President has his responsibility and that is now a great burden.

I commend to the legal minds and to the lawyers of this body for their consideration the observations which I have made. We are now facing what appears to me to be a very serious constitutional barrier and I do not think that we should regard it lightly.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this amendment is clearly legislation, and that if anybody had made a point of order against it in time it would have been sustained. The trouble is that no point of order was made against it. This is clearly legislation not germane to this bill, because it refers to other acts of legislation.

Mr. COOLEY. My recollection is that the point of order was made and the Chair held that it was a limitation, and was properly before the House.

Mr. EBERHARTER. No point of order was made against this particular amendment.

Mr. COOLEY. My objection is fundamental. It is to the method of legislating with regard to individuals. As I have said, we can lay down standards, we can say that there shall be a certain standard for holding office, but that standard shall be applicable to all the 130,000,000 people of America. You cannot lay down one standard for one man and another standard for all the other people of America.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I agree with what the gentleman has said, but I do not believe the gentleman wants to be understood as saying that the Dies committee could not introduce a bill in support of what they think should be done to correct this situation.

Mr. COOLEY. In the first place, the Dies committee is not one of the legislative committees of the House. I even question the right of the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee to pick out a single citizen of this great Nation and say that because of some beliefs that he entertains he shall not hold office.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is correct about that in my opinion, but I want to get this over, that there is nothing to prevent the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] from introducing a bill to correct the vices that he has found.

Mr. COOLEY. I think that the gentleman from Texas [Mr DIES] or any member of his committee would find it very difficult to draft legislation to correct these vices.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman is correct in his assumption that the House should not interfere with the right of people to hold office in the executive agencies, will he tell us what the remedy is when a person is appointed to office in an executive agency who spends his time not carrying out the mandate of Congress, but in doing a thing which is entirely subversive, which does the people no good, but on the other hand, does them harm? What is the remedy?

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman propounds a pertinent question. I regret, and frankly confess that I do not know just how to deal with the problem. I agree with the gentleman that something should be done about it. I want to make this clear: That I would delight to do something to free the pay rolls of this country from the crackpots and others who should not be holding jobs.

Mr. MOTT. There is always a remedy both in the matter of an elected officer and in the matter of an appointed officer. If it is an appointed officer and his confirmation by the Senate is necessary, then the Senate has the right to act.

Mr. COOLEY. But does the House have the right to act?

Mr. MOTT. No; but if a man is elected as a Member of this House, then the House has the right to pass upon his qualifications for office.

Mr. COOLEY. That is correct. The House has the right to pass upon the question of seating or refusing to seat a Member.

Mr. MOTT. Yes.

Mr. COOLEY. But suppose, as I suggest, that the President were to take one of these persons, which I pray he will not, and appoint him to the office of judge, and the Senate confirmed him, then could we as a legislative body withhold salary from him?

Mr. MOTT. Then I think our remedy would be by impeachment, but I do not understand that we can impeach every one of these subordinate officers who spends his time in carrying on subversive activities instead of carrying out the law of Congress.

Mr. COOLEY. The statement has been made that we were trying, convicting, and condemning these individuals.

Mr. MOTT. Oh, I think that statement is incorrect.

Mr. COOLEY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MOTT. If a man is a Communist it does not require evidence to convince me that he should not be on the Government pay roll, and if there is evidence before the Congress that a man is a crackpot and not capable of carrying out the duties of his position, then I think we should withhold his salary.

Mr. COOLEY. It has been stated that we have accused him of a great crime. We have not, because it is not a crime to be a Communist in America.

Mr. MOTT. If the Congress decides that they are people who are not working in the interest of the Government, they should not be on the pay roll, and I think it is perfectly proper by legislation to withhold their salaries.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But is it not a fact that we have people running on the Communist ticket for public office?

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman is correct. It is not a crime, however much I may differ with them who entertain that philosophy.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The power of appointment to office rests with the Executive, and the Executive is responsible to the people, and if there is any criticism to be made of that appointment, then criticism comes from the people in the direction of the Executive, and when we say that a person who has been appointed shall not be paid, we are infringing upon the right of the Executive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to see if I can get a time limit on this debate?

Mr. O'NEAL. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a very important amendment. It is fundamental, and I think we should have ample time to debate it.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I am forced to move that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEWART) there were—ayes 97, noes 52.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I have always been very jealous of the fact that this House has acted in an intelligent, sound and sane way. I like to see legislation properly drawn and well thought out. I feel that this amendment has not been well thought out, and if the committee will merely understand what the amendment provides and what it is trying to do, there would be very few Members who would vote for it.

I am not discussing the merits of the amendment, but I am discussing the manner and method of trying to do something which is not logical and which accomplishes nothing.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] reads as follows:

> No part of any appropriation or authorization in this act shall be used to pay any part of the salary or expenses of any person as prohibited from being paid in any other act.

In other words, the gentleman says in this amendment that no money appropriated for the Treasury and Post Office Departments shall be used to pay the salary of anybody proscribed in any other act. That is the interpretation of this amendment. The amendment in effect says that if you deny use of Treasury and Post Office money from employing Pickens in this bill, then you may not use Treasury and Post Office money to employ him in another department. That seems quite illogical to me.

I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact that section 302 of this act is in every appropriation act passed during the last Congress and no doubt will be in every appropriation act passed during this Congress, in which all of the people you are trying to keep off of the pay rolls are prohibited from being employed in his respective department.

In other words, the acts as they now stand, and as they will stand in this session of Congress, prohibits the employment of those people with subversive records. That stops everyone on the pay roll, and the Dirksen amendment attempts to go a little further and say that no money in this bill shall be used to employ such people elsewhere. Of course, it cannot be, and if the gentleman meant to stop employment in any other bureau, then his amendment would have been subject to a point of order. But he does not say that. He says none of the money in this bill shall be used to pay for the employment of a man in another branch. Well, it could not be done, since you appropriate only for the Treasury and Post Office in this bill. In the second place, it would be prohibited by the very bill dealing with the appropriation for that branch by a similar section 302 carried in every bill.

It seems to me that legislation of that sort is so meaningless, so involved, and so lacking in proper procedure that it should not even be entertained. And that has nothing to do with the merits of the individual case.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'NEAL. I yield.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman's interpretation of section 302 of this bill is a very loose interpretation, because Harry Bridges could be hired by any department of the Government if he swore he was not a Communist now and did not advocate the overthrow of the Government.

Mr. O'NEAL. The gentleman from Illinois, like this amendment, is trying to do something else. The amendment does not change that one particle. The amendment would not correct a situation of that sort.

Mr. MASON. I am talking about section 302.

Mr. O'NEAL. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has no basis for insertion in this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that five gentlemen were on their feet and that the 15 remaining minutes will be divided equally among those five gentlemen.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the time that was allotted to me.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the membership of this Committee has become somewhat impassioned over this subject matter today. It is obvious to me, and, in answer to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], may I state that in my humble opinion this House is the sole judge of its own qualifications and of its own standards, and just as the Senate can confirm or refuse to ratify, so this House can set any standards which it sees fit, respecting its appropriations and their restrictions, as to the amounts or who administers them.

As for me today, I have not made charges, I have not heard details of any charges, and I have not of necessity believed the charges that have been made, in deciding my votes today. I simply have acted on logic. If a man is an employee of this Government and if some people have seen fit to question his loyalty, and knowing, as I do, that he has no property right in the job which he holds, why can I not, as a Member of this House, vote to have him taken from the pay roll? Indeed, if I am empowered to use my wisdom or lack of it in arriving at the amount of an appropriation, by that same token I am empowered to use my wisdom or lack of it in restricting that appropriation. Whatever this Congress can create, this Congress can destroy, be it authority, an appropriation, or any other thing—including a job any person may hold. Therefore, if a man's character has come into question, be he Communist, be he white, black, green, or yellow, I say to you that arbitrarily, based again on our wisdom or lack of it, we can lop off the salary of any person as we see fit, and particularly are we bound in duty to do this when the loyalty of the person involved has been questioned. That is what I have done today. I did not of necessity believe the charges that I have heard. I may or may not believe them. I do believe that sufficient question has been raised to announce to this country that a man or woman does not have a property right in any Federal job. If their name or associations have led any prudent man to believe that they may have now or may have had in the past any communistic tendencies to overthrow our form of government with force and violence, that being true, we can certainly vote them out of any job that we see fit.

I do hope this Congress is not put in a false position. I have not of necessity subscribed to any charges I have heard today; I have exercised my privilege given me by those whom I attempt to represent. A man's loyalty has been questioned and also his fitness to hold the position. I therefore can report to my people that since his loyalty was questioned, I favored somebody for that assignment whose loyalty has not been questioned. This is what the House has done. To those, be they lawyers or laymen, who stand on this floor and allow the words to fall from their lips that the House today indicted, convicted, and executed certain people, I say to them, regardless of their profession, that they do not know whereof they speak; they are trying to hide behind something that does not exist. I say to you this man was fired, and he was fired because his loyalty to this Government has been questioned, and there are a lot of citizens to take his place whose loyalty has not been questioned; I am for them and so are you.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the House this afternoon rejected the amendment presented by the gentleman from Florida, and I will give you my reasons. I reached the floor late in the discussion on the amendment—too late to obtain time to speak on it. I learned some interesting facts. The name of George Slaff, of Passaic, N. J., in my congressional district, is among the names in the list of 38. He was listed as chief attorney for the Federal Power Commission I called the Commission and learned this: He was chief attorney for the Commission, but he is no longer; he is in Algiers, Africa, serving with the American Red Cross after months of service in the British Isles—this after he tried on four different occasions to enlist in the Army but was prevented because he was classified 4F by his local board on account of physical disability. I called the American Red Cross and they told me he held a high administrative post; in fact, there was an indication that he was second in command over there with the Red Cross in Algiers, doing, the Red Cross reported, a magnificent job. This proves, I say to you, that we cannot meet this problem in the mass way we attempted to this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEWART] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman, I think today will mark the beginning of a feeling on the part of the people of restored confidence in their legislative body. It makes no difference who is lopped off by an executive who has full discretion to hire and fire; it does not destroy anybody's political potentialities, but the framers of the Constitution gave us certain rights. We have given those rights to the executive. The power to give carries with it the power to take away. This may not be the mild way. We cannot see possibly the first 2 years of some person's interest in a subversive organization, but when those in authority and in a position to learn do not, or ignore what they learn, and fail to keep improper persons off the Government pay roll, our action in taking advantage of legislation by an amendment and striking them from the pay roll is going to meet with the approval of my folks. They are fed up with some of the things that have been going on.

It was my good fortune in the forty-first session of the Oklahoma Legislature to head a committee of the Oklahoma Senate which investigated subversive activities in our State. We found a school teacher in the university who owned 500 U. S. S. R. bonds at a time when the Communists were just as mad with us as the Germans are today. We fired him. He came to Washington and I am told got a $6,500 job—a hundred percent raise. Over in Oklahoma we are fed up with this kind of politics.

We brought this condition about by certain legislation, and all the errors are primarily chargeable to us. We may have some secondary excuse to pass the buck, but when it is all brought home we are responsible and chargeable with it, and justly so. Some of these days if we do not stick our neck up to that clock on the wall against this organized labor group running the country we are going to have here some people who are not going to be too much in sympathy with them. These are predictions from a freshman, but just put your ears out where the woods are burning and the grass is on fire and you will learn the truth of my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] is recognized.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, by the action that the House recently took on the Pickens case and by that it will undoubtedly take on this amendment, it is, in my opinion, ignoring the realities of a world where nations and people are fighting for survival. We are ignoring the lessons that the blood-spilling of patriotic men is teaching the peoples throughout the world. We are ignoring the enemy's secret weapon and permitting it to be used successfully against us.

That lesson is that since 1922 both fascism and nazi-ism have used as their secret weapon in their technique for conquest the anti-Communist line. Mussolini marched on Rome with the slogan of saving Italy from bolshevism. Hitler advanced into power on the same vehicle. Later there was established in Berlin an anti-Comintern axis of Japan, fascist Italy, and Hitler.

This Axis has used as a technique for conquest from within, a technique which was successful in France and many other countries, the laying down of a smoke screen of anticommunism. Behind that smoke screen they have marched on and have captured and destroyed democratic institutions in their own countries and in the countries they have conquered. Only last Saturday Hitler again raised the anti-Communist cry. Hitler proclaimed to the world that he was fighting to save the world from bolshevism. He again raised the anti-Communist cry in order to defeat the men on the battlefield, our men and the men of our allies; raised it again for the purpose of winning his battles against the democratic peoples of the world. He used the anti-Communist cry, "Save the world from bolshevism" in the hope that he would divide the people of the various nations, in the hope he would split them and then conquer them. A comparison of Hitler's speech with some of those made here this week would shock our men on the battlefields by the similarity of words, ideas, and the line adopted. And again, today, the Congress of the United States, the greatest deliberative body in any democracy in the world, reechoes the anti-Communist line of Adolf Hitler and scores another victory against democracy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW) there were—ayes 144, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COURTNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, 1944, H. R. 1648, had come to no resolution thereon.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next after disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of other special orders previously granted, I may be permitted to proceed for 45 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief editorial from the New York Times.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT] may be permitted to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the Treasury-Post Office Department bill and its consideration will be continued on Monday?

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am qualified to answer that. I assume it will. I am trying to locate the majority leader to see what his understanding is.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the Speaker can tell us.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was of the opinion that this bill would be concluded today.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, some statement ought to be made, in view of the statement yesterday by the majority leader that there would be no roll call on the resolution which comes up Monday, if it does come up.

The SPEAKER. That was the statement of the majority leader and that will be carried out.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I understand from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] that the majority leader has informed him that the business on Monday will be further consideration of the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill. We will take it up on Monday.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order on Tuesday next for 10 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that that special order be extended to 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next at the conclusion of the legislation business in order for the day and the other special orders I may have 20 minutes, following the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include a letter addressed to Senator THOMAS, of Oklahoma, together with a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce, Madill, Okla., and others, and a statement of activities of acquisition, Department of United States Army at Denison Dam project.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEWART]?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, my constituents in the Denison Dam area are very much grieved with the price paid and the delay before payment is made for lands acquired by the Army in the construction of the Denison Dam. Most of these people are small landowners, and in most cases they are thrown into the Federal court, the cases are tried at Muskogee, Okla., the farthest court town in the eastern district of Oklahoma, despite the fact that 28 miles to the east is the city of Durant, a court town, and 28 miles to the west is Ardmore, a court town. The expenses of attorney fees, witness fees, and attending court are prohibitive in most cases. These citizens are subjected to accepting a price for their homes that is in many cases under the appraisement by the Government and they are compelled to wait from 6 months to 2 years for their money. In most cases this land represents the savings of a lifetime, and the appraisement was made back when land was of less value than today. These home owners cannot in any other location purchase with the money received from the Government a home comparable to the one acquired from them. They are entitled to relief from this body if our legal machinery is permitted to clog to the point where delay will absorb their entire interest in their land.

The inadequate price paid for the land is but one grievance. There are 70 producing oil wells in the Cumberland oil field in Marshall and Bryan Counties, with a daily allowable of 8,000 barrels. No adjustment has been made with the royalty owners nor the operators of the leasehold estates, no material has been made available so the structures above the water line can be constructed. The depth of the water will vary from a few inches to 64 feet, and without an adjustment will close and shut down this field for an indefinite period of time. This letter, resolution, and statement of facts was compiled solely by interested citizens of Madill, Okla. If the Members of Congress will take time to read these written instruments, I believe they will convince each and every one of you. We believe this complaint of sufficient magnitude that Congress should interest themselves to looking into these complaints. The letter, the resolution, and the statement of facts are as follows:

FIDELITY AND GUARANTY FIRE CORPORATION,
Baltimore, January 28, 1943.

Hon. ELMER THOMAS,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. PAUL STEWART,
United States Congressman,

Re Denison Dam.

GENTLEMEN: I am writing you this joint letter concerning the inundation of the oil field here at Madill. Most of the leases in the field are owned by the Pure Oil Co. and they have close to 70 producing wells. The allowable for the field is over 8,000 barrels daily.

All the existing wells will be included in the inundation and the depth of the water above the top of the wells is from inches to 64 feet.

I am informed that it takes steel and concrete and time to arrange for these wells to produce. I have also been advised that the Government expects to close the gates in July. The Government has made no good faith attempt to settle with the Pure Oil Co. or the individual landowners here. The holder of the lease cannot get steel and material to build a structure so that they can produce the well after the water is over it.

Under the circumstances, I believe that you should take some kind of definite affirmative action against the War Department. They are taking a third of our tax valuation in our county. It does look like they could either leave the gates open until material is available so we can complete our oil field. The oil field is the only thing we have left. It furnishes money for roads and for schools and we are all vitally interested in it.

I hope you gentlemen will do something about this at an early date.

Very truly yours,

M. E. EWING.

RESOLUTION OF CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, MADILL, OKLA., AND OTHERS

Whereas there are about 70 producing oil wells in the Cumberland field in Marshall and Bryan Counties, east of Madill, Okla., and the undersigned have been advised that the Denison Dam Authority expects to close the gates in July of this year and thus inundate said oil field;

Whereas no adjustment has been made with the royalty owners nor the operators of the leasehold estates and no material has been made available so that structures above the water line can be constructed and said oil field continued in its operation; and

Whereas the depth of the water above said wells will be from inches to 64 feet in said oil field and will cause same to be closed and shut down for an indefinite period of time;

Whereas said Denison Dam Authority has taken approximately a third of the taxable wealth in Marshall County and has already seriously damaged the revenues of Marshall County, as well as many school districts thereof, and has made no attempt to adjustment; and

Whereas said Cumberland oil field now has an allowable of over 8,000 barrels daily: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Oklahoma delegation in Congress be advised by this resolution of the action on the part of the Denison Dam Authority with the request that they do everything possible to prevent the closing of the gates of the Dam until sufficient material is available so that proper structures may be builded and said oil field continued in its operation; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, Gen. George C. Marshall, War Department, Washington, D. C., the Oklahoma delegation in Congress, and Robert S. Kerr, Governor of the State of Oklahoma.

STATEMENT OF ACTIVITIES OF ACQUISITION DEPARTMENT OF UNITED STATES ARMY AT DENISON DAM PROJECT

About January 1, 1940, the Acquisition Department of the United States Army began acquiring land for the Denison Dam project. At this time practically all the land has been acquired. No material financial gain to any person can now be made. This statement is made out of a sense of loyalty and patriotism, so that the injustices perpetrated here may be corrected in the future at other places. The undersigned sincerely hope and trust that the most careful consideration will be given to this complaint.

The reason for this statement of fact is because of (1) inefficiency, (2) inadequate price, (3) chiseling on the part of the Acquisition Department.

These matters will be discussed in the order set forth above.

INEFFICIENCY

The inefficiency divides itself into: (1) Time, (2) red tape, (3) jealousies.

TIME

It has taken from 6 months to 2 years from the date an offer is signed to close an ordinary land transaction. The following tracts of land are cited to demonstrate the correctness of the above statement, to wit:

K-351-3, K-267-2, K-60-5, K-36-14, K-59-3, K-84-2, K-59-4, K-60-4, K-351-5, K-61-11, K-84-1, K-84-4, K-84-3, K-36-10, K-60-6, K-59-1, K-352-4, K-36-13, K-107-4, K-60-7, K-84-8, K-60-3, K-81-5.

The above does not include time for appraisement but dates from the time the owner of the land and the Department agrees on the price to be paid for the land.

In private business land deals are closed in a period of from 1 to 10 days.

Closing a land deal, after the price is agreed upon, consists only in an abstract showing title, a deed in accordance with the contract, and payment.

When the acquisition commenced here the contact men advised the home owners that the deal could be closed in from 60 to 90 days. These statements were relied upon to the detriment of the individual. It caused them great inconvenience.

RED TAPE

The undersigned do not know all the various forms involved in closing an ordinary land transaction with the Army, but do state that the following is a part of it:

The land is appraised by a Government appraiser. His report is filed at Denison, Tex. This is then forwarded to the division at Dallas, Tex., and, finally, through various departmental heads—majors, colonels, generals, and the like—it is reviewed at Washington, D. C. The man in Washington never looks at the land, but he must approve or disapprove the appraisement. After it is approved and corrected, it then takes the same circuitous rote back and finally it reaches the Denison office.

The home owner is then contacted. He is not shown the appraisement. The amount of the appraisement is not disclosed to him. He is not offered the amount of the appraisement. They do tell him that they can accept an offer for so much money. This, in most cases, is much less than the appraised value. Further details on this matter will be set forth under the subject Chiseling.

An offer is signed. The home owner knows he must move and he signs an offer. This written offer allows the Government an unlimited period of time to close the deal. The Department will not permit any time limit to be inserted in the offer. The offer is then sent by the Denison office from captain to major to colonel to general by way of Dallas and other points until it reaches the War Department in Washington, D. C. It is then either accepted or rejected and then it takes its circuitous route back to the Denison office and then the home owner is notified of the action taken.

An abstract is then ordered. The attorney at Denison examines it. The attorney at Dallas examines it. It is then sent from captain to major to general by way of Dallas and other points until it reaches the War Department in Washington, D. C. It is then transferred over to the Attorney General of the United States and he examines the abstract and also the opinions of the other attorneys and renders an opinion of title. It then takes a circuitous route from general to colonel to major to captain by way of several points back to Denison, Tex. We think it can be safely stated that no title in the Denison Dam area has passed without one or more rigid requirements.

The abstract and opinions are then given to the title division. They then determine whether the land should be condemned or an attempt made to cure the title. The home owner is not consulted and given an opportunity to cure any defect.

Most of the land is condemned. However, authority must be procured from Washington. This is done through the same circuitous method outlined above. When authority is given, the abstracts are redated and sent to the special attorney for the Department of Justice. He then examines the abstracts and files a condemnation suit in Federal court. Although the price is agreed upon, the home owner is served with an order stating that on a day certain title will be determined. It is usually about 4 to 6 months in the future. The title is usually determined at Muskogee, Okla., a distance of 180 miles or more from the home owner. He must be present or hazard the loss of all proceeds if someone appears and claims the land.

The Federal court then appoints three commissioners to value the land. This is true even though the Government and the home owner have agreed, by an offer and an acceptance, on a price for the land.

After about 30 days the commissioners make a return. They do not show a great deal of speed for the reason they are paid $25 a day. When their report is filed, there is a 30-day waiting period.

After this time a written transcript, duly certified, is sent, by the circuitous route, to the Attorney General of the United States. He then examines the transcript and authorizes payment.

It is then in order to pay the home owner and the matter is referred to the finance section and the money deposited with the clerk of the court.

After this notice is given to all parties, that the funds will be distributed on a day certain, the court makes an order of distribution and checks are issued.

We have not included in this statement all the red tape, but we think enough has been shown to point out the defects.

If it did not work so many hardships it would be comical.

JEALOUSIES

In going through the red tape above if there appears any minor or insignificant error or omission it is referred back to the Denison office. It seems that the Department in Washington, D. C., delights in pointing out any error. There is little or no cooperation Voluminous reports are required by Washington constantly.

Then the head of the title division at the Denison office and the special attorney for the Department of Justice at Oklahoma City have been at outs constantly. The special attorney thinks the head of the title department incompetent and the head of the title department thinks the special attorney has the swell head. They may both be correct. It is thought the special attorney was too technical and the head of the title department too quick to recommend condemnation. The home owner was not second, third, or fourth His rights were never considered by either of the gentlemen.

There is some department at Washington that prescribes the rules and regulations regarding abstracts. In the early spring of 1942 they issued regulations regarding the preparation and the like of abstracts in this area. They took various regulations from various States in the Union and threw them together. Time will not permit a statement regarding these rules in detail. We say that none of the abstractors in Marshall, Bryan, Love, or Johnston County would bid under the terms of the regulations. Also, the rules and regulations were such that none of the abstractors like to talk about them. This retarded the closing of deals wherein acceptable offers were made almost a year ago.

By reason of the red tape involved it is necessary that an officer with the rank of major at the Dallas division office certify that the price to be paid for a given tract of land is in accordance with the appraisement. In the shuffle the original appraisements were in Washington. They had only mimeographed copies with the blanks filled in either on typewriter or pencil. Not having the originals the majors and higher ranking officials refused to sign a certificate. Fortunately, however, C B Sweltzer was in the Denison office when they were made He would gladly so certify if he were made a major. We do not know what finally happened in this matter.

INADEQUATE PRICE

In the years 1938–39 various officials of the Acquisition Department made surveys for the purpose of determining fair market value. On account of the depression, prices then were low when compared with 1941 and 1942 prices The value of the land was based, in the main on sales from absentee owners and loan companies to speculators Only a small number of sales from a resident owner to a resident owner were considered. Based on these valuations, the land was appraised. The home owners have been unable to relocate themselves with the amount received. Price of peanuts advanced from 75 cents per bushel to $2 per bushel Cotton advanced in price from 9 cents a pound to 18 cents a pound Corn advanced from 40 cents a bushel to $1 a bushel Oats advanced from 25 cents a bushel to 60 cents a bushel Hogs doubled and cattle were up a third Pecans advanced from 8 cents a pound to 20 cents a pound. Dairy products doubled. However, the Land Department kept its old appraisement and used the same old scale of values. Land in this vicinity has advanced from 25 to 40 percent, and thus the home owner who did not desire to sell has been compelled to consume the difference.

The Department admits they used the 1938–39 scale of values but states since further investigating that that scale of values is correct now.

CHISELING

Not being satisfied with the 1938–39 values as a value basis, the contact men for the Department would go to the home owner; tell him he could accept an offer for so much money and close the deal in from 60 to 90 days. Most of the home owners were not satisfied with the price and would so state. They would later follow up and state the land would have to be condemned in court. They would state that the amount they mentioned was the full amount they could pay and was the amount of the appraisement. These statements were false. They were not offering the amount of the appraisement and the deals were not closed within 60 to 90 days. Of course, our proof on this statement is limited. We think this happened in about 75 percent of the cases.

We do cite tract No. K–151–10. In this case J. O. Flynt was the owner. Her father, Gene W. Flynt, handled her business. He refused, at first, to take the amount the contact man said the Government would accept an offer for. Later he was contacted and advised the land would be put in condemnation. The contact man said $900 was the full appraised value; not another dime could be paid. Under the circumstances and knowing the cost of litigating with the Government, he accepted $900. The true appraisement, if not changed, was $1,400.

Also, we cite tract No. K–239–3. In this case Mary Catherine Little was the owner. Reuel W. Little was attending to her business for her. The contact man, Darwin Harbin, advised that $3,280 was the full amount of the appraisement and the full amount he was authorized to pay. After trying for about a year to get the amount raised the $3,280 was accepted by a letter written to the Denison division. The actual appraisement was $3,500 and the records will so show, if not changed.

It will be admitted by the acquisition department that the offers and the amounts paid are less than the Government appraisement. However, they will state that these offers were voluntarily made. The truth is, most were signed after being advised the land would be put into condemnation in order to avoid costly litigation.

JURY TRIAL

While it is true the home owner may refuse to sign an offer and in due course of time the Government will file suit, he is allowed to object to the report of the commissioners and demand a jury trial. This remedy, however, is only theoretical. It is not a practical remedy for these reasons:

1. Most of the tracts of land are small. The home owner, or his attorney, must travel 180 miles to Muskogee when title is determined. When his case is heard either at Ardmore, Okla., 28 miles away, or Durant, Okla., 28 miles away, or Ada, Okla., 50 miles away, he should have three good land appraisers view the land and appear as witnesses. He, or his attorney, must appear, usually at Muskogee, Okla., again when funds are distributed. This all costs at least $500.

2. The Department at Denison, under existing laws, has the power to take possession upon filing suit to condemn. When there is a dispute as to value this is always done. From the time the suit is filed until the case is tried usually a year elapses. The improvements, not being occupied, run down. The land looks its worst because not in cultivation. In some instances, they have cut down trees allowing them to fall across cultivating land. Then in each case they insist that the jury view the land.

3. The Department at Denison, before any case was tried, contacted nearly all experienced land men in the area and put them on the pay roll. They receive at least $10 a day. About twenty have been employed from time to time. Most of the remaining experienced land men have had some kind of trouble with the Department. This, of course, can be shown if they appear as a witness.

4. In times like these the ordinary juror feels inclined to favor the Government, and they, of course, know nothing of the background.

5. The judges allow the Government officials to open the evidence and close the evidence, and open the argument and close the argument.

EFFECT ON MORALE AND WAR EFFORT

The above depicted situation has a direct effect on the war effort for these reasons:

1. Manpower used is excessive. They have in the branch office at Denison, Tex., 35 regularly employed men and women. They have been there about 3 year. Hundreds are employed in the division office at Dallas. Thousands in this department at Washington, D. C One man, with authority could, with three lawyers, experienced in examining title in the area involved, and three good stenographers and four appraisers and a handy man, acquire the land involved at its fair market value in 6 months at the outside.

2. People who have been mistreated, even though they know it is not intentional on the part of their Government; and is only the men in charge, know they are helpless and cannot correct the evil. It thus affects adversely the sale of bonds, donations to Red Cross, collection of scrap iron, and the full production of food to win the war.

3. When people are compelled to leave homes they have cherished and built and cannot locate themselves because they have not been paid and have been chiseled in the deal and this is all done by the Army, they normally are proud of, it makes them think the Army is in charge of evil, selfish men.

The present system of acquiring land by the Army is un-American, undemocratic, and unlike the Army.

However laudable the intentions of the Government may be, if men, of evil design and selfish purpose, execute the program, it will fail.

Such acts, as the ones depicted here, will cause the present progressive administration to go down the next time it is judged by the American people, and will usher in an ultraconservative party.

We recommend the following:

1. When the Army in the future desires to acquire land the Secretary of War be authorized to appoint a man, not connected with the Army, to acquire it. He should be empowered to purchase abstracts, have them examined by attorneys of good repute, and employ competent appraisers, and pay for the land when conveyances are executed and delivered. No attempt should be made to purchase land for less than its fair market value. The man so appointed should not be permitted to employ any official in the Army nor any key man in the present set-up.

Be it resolved That this statement be furnished to the President of the United States with the request that he not be bothered with it, since his burdens on other matters are too heavy; but, with the request one of his able secretaries give it careful consideration. A copy be sent to the Oklahoma congressional delegation in Washington, D. C., and Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, and Gen. Henry Marshall, and such other persons as the president of the chamber of commerce may think proper.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

(Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do this in order to clear up any misunderstanding that may exist. Do I correctly understand that the statement made by the majority leader on yesterday to the effect that there would be no roll calls on Monday still holds?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. Of course, the present situation was not anticipated. However, if it is agreeable to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, it is to be understood that if there are any roll calls on this bill they will take place on Tuesday. If this bill is disposed of early Monday, we can then proceed with the merger bill.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield, that does not mean we will not have votes in the Committee of the Whole on amendments that are offered on Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. No.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We will complete the reading of this appropriation bill for amendment, and then if there are any roll calls they will go over to Tuesday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, there may be quorum calls. No one has any control over that.

Mr. LUDLOW. If the gentleman will yield, I believe it is understood on our side that a roll call will be demanded on one of the amendments to the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill. Would the agreement the gentleman has made interfere with that, or would it postpone the final consideration of the Treasury-Post Office bill until Tuesday? We do not want that to happen.

Mr. McCORMACK. The agreement is that we will proceed with the consideration of this appropriation bill under the 5-minute rule on Monday, and then at the conclusion of that, if there are any roll calls, the roll calls will go over to the next day. I have already stated to the House, anticipating that we would dispose of this bill today, that the merger bill would come up on Monday and that if there were any roll calls on that bill it would go over until Tuesday

Mr. LUDLOW. This bill has been before the House a long time. It was our sincere hope that we could pass the bill on Monday.

Mr. McCORMACK. If you complete the consideration of the bill on Monday, then whatever roll calls there may be will occur on Tuesday. A roll call does not take much time. We could meet at 11 o'clock on Tuesday if necessary.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The roll call would be the first business in order on Tuesday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. From a practical angle, therefore, there would be no delay. However, I have already stated to the House that there would be no roll call on Monday, and some Members may have made their plans accordingly.

Mr. LUDLOW. I appreciate that. Of course, I do not want in any way to interfere with the gentleman's agreement, which I know the gentleman wants to respect.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. May I submit this observation for the consideration of both of our distinguished leaders, the majority leader and the minority leader. I think it is unfortunate when any agreement is made here which has the effect of letting Members think they can go off and stay and come back sometime and walk in and cast a vote. I think Members ought to be on the floor of this House when we consider the rest of this bill, all of it, and not just be here Tuesday when they vote. If this very clear-cut understanding we are working out now has the effect of letting Members on either side of the aisle leave here and not come back until Tuesday, I think it is unfortunate.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It is hoped that everybody will be here. My observation of yesterday in relation to the merger bill is no precedent as to the future. It was confined to that bill, in the anticipation that this appropriation bill would be disposed of today. Having stated that if there were any roll call on the merger bill it would be postponed to Tuesday, I feel that I am bound by that statement as far as this bill is concerned, if there is a roll call, inasmuch as it is now going over to Monday.

[Here the gavel fell.]

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), under its order previously adopted, the House adjourned until Monday, February 8, 1943, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

There will be a meeting of a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 10 a. m. Monday February 8, 1943. Business to be considered: Hearing on H. R. 649, "For the organization and functions of the Public Health Service."

COMMITTEE ON WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1943

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, apart from Thee all is vanity and vexation of spirit. Thou hast taught us that our lives are the temples of Thy holy presence. Made in Thy image no despot may enslave our conscience. Against the defilement by impious hands of that sacred inner shrine we pledge a sacrifice from which no Gethsemane or Calvary can hold us back. Strengthen our will to halt the designs of the tyrants, who would bring us and other nations under their evil domination.

Give courage to our stalwart men who on the far-flung battle lines of freedom are baring their breasts to the fire of the foe and putting their lives a living wall between threatening danger and our destiny. Stir up in the whole body of the people an adventurous willingness, even as they pour out the crimson cost of war, so also for international good will to dare bravely; that on the ruins of man's hate we may build a new and fairer home for humanity worthy to house all the children of Thy love and care—as glorious from the heavens above shall come the city of our God. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 4, 1943, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON ALIEN REGISTRATION

A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization on alien registration under date of February 1, 1943 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORT OF ATTORNEY GENERAL ON CERTIFICATES FILED REQUISITE TO THE PROSECUTION OF THE WAR—WAIVING OF CIVIL ACTIONS UNDER ANTITRUST AND OTHER LAWS

A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of certificates filed by the Chairman of the War Production Board, for the period October 1, 1942, through January 31, 1943, as to the doing of any act or thing or the omission to do any act or thing requisite to the prosecution of the war by any person or persons for which no prosecution or civil action shall be commenced under the antitrust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

THE PUBLIC DOMAIN

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation declaring certain lands to be a part of the public domain and providing for the administration thereof (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

A letter from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, two lists of papers and documents on the files of the Federal Works Agency which are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and requesting action looking to their disposition (with accompanying papers); to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. BREWSTER members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of Idaho, dealing with the hospitalization of veterans; to the Committee on Finance.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. CLARK of Idaho on the 4th instant, p. 567, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

By Mr. CAPPER:

A petition of sundry citizens of Fort Scott, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit liquor sales in the vicinity of military camps and naval establishments; ordered to lie on the table.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

"Whereas a great highway is now being constructed from the Province of Alberta, Canada, to Fairbanks, Alaska, and the Pan American Highway from Mexico through Central America into South America is now being extended and these roads now being built and planned will, when completed, in conjunction with the connecting system of major highways in the United States, constitute a great inter-American transportation system linking the two continents and affording arteries for commerce and travel; and

"Whereas the Rocky Mountain States lie in the shortest and most direct line between the Canadian and Mexican border terminals of this international route; and

"Whereas four of our great national parks with splendid roads systems connect directly with this alinement, being Glacier, Yellowstone, Rocky Mountain, and Carlsbad Caverns National Parks, as well as Jasper and Banff National Parks of Canada; and

"Whereas completed major highways in the Rocky Mountain States constitute the greater portion of the route traversed, conveniently connecting these national parks and making accessible the entire scenic and recreational area of the Mountain States; and

"Whereas the improvements and construction of a great master highway between the Canadian and Mexican terminals of this international route will afford an opportunity for gainful employment during the post-war adjustment period and provide an activity for these States which do not possess normal industrial facilities to employ their population in the post-war period: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the Thirty-fourth General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That it respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to now take such steps as will provide plans, ready for immediate execution upon the termination of the war, and the necessary appropriations, so that road improvements needed to create a great master highway north and south through the States of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas may be undertaken with the least delay, thus providing employment in the post-war adjustment period and an inter-American transportation system as in this memorial outlined: Be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this joint memorial be forwarded at once to the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, as the presiding officers of the Congress of the United States, and to Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON and Hon. EUGENE D. MILLIKIN, Senators, and Hon. LAWRENCE LEWIS, Hon. WILLIAM S. HILL, Hon. J. EDGAR CHENOWETH, and Hon. ROBERT F. ROCKWELL, Representatives, from the State of Colorado."

(The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.)

By Mr. GREEN:

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Whereas the jewelry and silversmith industries have made for many years one of the most important contributions to the economic structure in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations and in New England; and

"Whereas in the past, thousands of citizens of this State and of the other New England States have depended upon these industries for livelihood, and will do so in the future; and

"Whereas, at the present time there are certain restrictions upon the use of silver that affect the said industries to the extent that, if remedial measures are not taken, it may mean certain economic collapse, not alone in said industries but in a far-reaching effect upon certain other manufactured goods that are depending upon the silver industry; and

"Whereas United States Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island, had introduced into the United States Congress at its seventy-seventh session, a bill to provide increased authority for the use of Government-owned silver in furtherance of the war effort which authorized the President of the United States of America, upon the recommendation of the chairman of the War Production Board, to sell or lease any silver held or owned by the United States, upon such terms as the Secretary of the Treasury deemed advisable and which, among other things, would have permitted the use of silver in the making of munitions, the supplying of civilian needs in connection with the war effort, and the converson of existing jewelry plants for such purposes, so that consumptive as well as non-consumptive uses of silver might have been provided; and

"Whereas, since this bill was not reported out favorably, United States Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, having the welfare of our country in mind, the industry of our State and all its employees, has reintroduced a similar bill into Congress at this Seventy-eighth Session, namely Senate bill 35, entitled 'A bill to authorize the use for war purposes of silver held or owned by the United States,' which bill has the endorsement of the War Production Board and the Treasury Department: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations be and it hereby does approve Senate bill 35, as presented by United States Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, and urges the Members of the Seventy-eighth Congress of the United States of America to pass said proposed legislation; and, be it further

"Resolved That the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States be and they hereby are respectfully requested to work for the passage of said Senate bill 35 and to express to the proper authorities the feeling of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations that this proposed measure is essential, particularly in view of the present war emergency; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state be authorized to transmit duly certified copies of this resolution to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States to the Chairman of the War Production Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency."

By Mr. GERRY:

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Finance:

"Whereas the primary aim of the Ruml plan is to put both the Government and all individual taxpayers on a current basis of tax payment on income, with the purpose of getting every taxpayer out of debt to the Government, without future income-tax claims against estates, a living man's wages or savings: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations now places itself on record as approving the Ruml plan now before Congress or any similar, genuine pay-as-you-go tax plan so that both the Government and all individual taxpayers may be placed upon a current basis of tax payment on income; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States be, and they hereby are, requested to use every effort to have the Ruml plan, so-called, or any similar genuine pay-as-you-go tax plan enacted into Federal law; and the secretary of state is hereby authorized and directed to transmit duly certified copies of this resolution to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States."

(Mr. GREEN presented a resolution identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.)

RESOLUTIONS OF SOUTH CAROLINA LEGISLATURE

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I present and ask to have appropriately referred a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina introduced by the aviation committee of the assembly.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has before it for consideration House bill H. R. 1012 and Senate bill 246 affecting air commerce; and

Whereas air commerce (air lines) represents a major part of civil aviation and private flying and fixed-base operations represent a major part of civil aviation whose operations are not interstate in character and therefore are of no concern of the Federal Government, the pending legislation would deny to the States their inherent rights to govern within their own State and would seriously jeopardize private flying and fixed-base operations; and

Whereas by applying the intent of this legislation to other forms of transportation our national economy would be seriously affected; and

Whereas there is no immediate need for this legislation as the President of the United States is vested with full power under the Defense Act to regulate all aircraft, civilian or otherwise, if necessary; and

Whereas those men who are serving their country in the various branches of service are unable to voice their sentiments or opinions on this proposed legislation at this time, and they are the persons who have contributed more to the development of aviation and are entitled to their place in aeronautics when and if they return from active duty; and

Whereas there is ample time for such legislation to be considered in the future since consideration has not been given future developments and improvements which will change methods now used in the regulation of aircraft: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the State Legislature of South Carolina respectfully requests that no action be taken on the above-mentioned bills or any similar bill or bills by Congress until the present war is over and peace is established; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the clerk of the United States Senate, the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, the clerk of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of Congress, and to each of the South Carolina Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAYBANK. I also present and ask to have appropriately referred another concurrent resolution adopted by the General Assembly of South Carolina introduced by Hon. B. D. Harrelson.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it has been the experience of the tobacco growers and the tobacco buyers in this State that the system of selling tobacco by auctioning, to the highest bidder, as has been the custom in this State for a great number of years, is the fairest and most satisfactory way of merchandising the tobacco crops of this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Government of the United States of America is hereby requested to acknowledge that the system used for merchandising the tobacco crops in this State is a fair and satisfactory manner of merchandising such crops, and said Government is further requested not to exercise any authority that would interfere with the manner in which tobacco crops are sold in this State; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the South Carolina Representatives in the Halls of Congress and to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States of America, with the request that the contents of this resolution be conveyed to the proper governmental authorities.

Mr. MAYBANK. I also present and ask to have appropriately referred a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina introduced by Messrs. E. V. Perry and Gardner.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the farmers in the State of South Carolina are putting forth their best efforts under adverse conditions to grow Irish potatoes, which are badly needed by the Government in the furtherance of the war effort; and

Whereas the increase in cost of production, including labor, fertilizer, materials, interest, taxes, and freight rates the farmers would have to pay approximately from 40 cents to 50 cents more for producing and marketing each bag of potatoes than they would realize from their efforts; and

Whereas the loss of these profits would not only cause the downfall of the farmers but would decrease the number of acres of potatoes planted and harvested for this year and in future years: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives, That the Office of Price Administration investigate the costs and expenses which the farmers would be put to in the planting and harvesting of these potatoes and fix a ceiling price, so that the farmer would receive a profit instead of a loss therefrom.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Hon. J. K. Galbraith, Deputy Office of Price Administration Administrator, a copy to Hon. James F. Byrnes, Stabilization Director, a copy to Hon. Burnet R. Maybank, a copy to Hon. E. D. Smith, United States Senators, and also a copy to each of the Congressmen from this State.

RESOLUTION OF KANSAS LEGISLATURE—BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY

Mr. REED. I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 7, adopted by the Kansas State Legislature, relating to the United States Bureau of Animal Industry.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By an act of Congress the United States Bureau of Animal Industry was created in 1884, under the direction of Dr. Solomon. The development and guidance of the Bureau has successfully brought about a disease-control program now operating under the direction of Dr. John R. Mohler, whose ability is recognized throughout the world as a genius in the control of livestock diseases and his administration of the present Federal meat-inspection program. Under his direction, foot-and-mouth disease has been eliminated from the United States, and the occurrence of such diseases as Texas fever, cattle and sheep scab, tuberculosis, anthrax, blackleg, hog cholera, malignant edema has either been minimized or practically eliminated in various sections of the United States. Through his endeavors, Federal meat inspection in the United States is recognized throughout the world, and through his scrutiny and effective quarantine programs we have been able to keep out many of the infectious diseases of foreign countries that are of untold values to the livestock interests of this country, as well as public health. Any curtailment of Dr. Mohler's authority could possibly bring about a serious menace to our livestock industry as well as to our meat food supply. The United States, Canada, and Mexico are reported to be the only three countries in the world today that are free of foot-and-mouth disease, which can be attributed directly to Dr. John R. Mohler's meat-inspection program, in cooperation with the Governments of Mexico and Canada.

Whereas we are advised that the Meat Inspection Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry has by Executive order been transferred from that Bureau to the new Food Distribution Division; and

Whereas no Government agency has functioned more efficiently in the interest of the livestock industry that the Meat Inspection Division in correlation with field inspection of the Bureau of Animal Industry in the quarantine and control of animal diseases: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Kansas Legislature, That the Bureau of Animal Industry be restored to its full power as has existed since 1884, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the Kansas United States Senators and to each of the Kansas Representatives in Congress.

RESOLUTION OF NORTH DAKOTA COUNTY COMMISSIONERS ASSOCIATION—GOOD ROADS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I present, and ask to have printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, a resolution adopted by the North Dakota County Commissioners Association on the 13th of January 1943.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it has been called to the attention of certain members of this association that rural postal routes are now traveling upon township and county roads which cannot be maintained in a proper manner for prompt delivery of mail; and

Whereas the bad condition and poor maintenance of such roads is due to the lack of funds of townships to construct and maintain such roads; and

Whereas the rural carriers of the State have requested the county commissioners to devise ways and means of improving rural-route roads by a matching of township, county, State, and Federal funds, if possible: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this association by appropriate action seek means of improving postal routes throughout the State by the use of township, county, State, and Federal funds wherever possible and by matching of funds of the several subdivisions and that the matter be further referred to the Federal Bureau of Public Roads for such action as they may see fit to take; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Members of Congress from this State requesting them to work and vote for sufficient funds during the coming session of Congress and subsequent sessions to the end that funds may be appropriated for the purpose of improving not only the rural postal routes in this State, but throughout the Nation.

WHAT THE PEOPLE WOULD LIKE TO KNOW—STATEMENT BY ALBERT D. NELSON

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I present to the Senate a statement by a citizen of Colorado, Mr. Albert D. Nelson, on the subject of What the People Would Like to Know, in which numerous questions are directed to the Congress. I ask that this document lie on the table where it may be available to Senators desiring to study the important questions which is raises.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Colorado will lie on the table.

CONDITIONS IN PUERTO RICO

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by Miguel Guerra-Mondragon, of San Juan, P. R., relative to conditions in Puerto Rico.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 2, 1943.

HON. WILLIAM LANGER,
Senator from North Dakota,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A recent press dispatch has quoted you as saying:
